A Childhood Lesson

I spent the holidays with my nieces, ages 2 and 5. Beyond their sweet silliness, what struck me about their lives is the opportunity to try new things. They have ballet and soccer practices, art and writing projects. I forgot that aspect of childhood. I still want to master skateboarding; but I'm more likely to buy another pair of Vans than to hit the half-pipe after work.

Most adults don't have time to take lessons or pick up an extra hobby. In our Health & Fitness issue, we offer a practical solution: seven sports you can learn on vacation and then continue back in Boston. We've also included exercise classes to help you stay in shape. Exploring her own well-being, our carnivorous copyeditor Linh Tran Brincat decided to go vegan for a week, a fish-out-of-water experience she chronicles in these pages.

Like Linh, our cover girl leaves behind the comfort of the familiar this year. As ER wraps its final season, actress Maura Tierney joins the cast of Rescue Me. Tierney tells us, "The older I get, the less patience I have for stuff." Too true. I bought my nieces mini soccer goals for Christmas. When the eldest got tangled in the net, she bounced right back. I'd need a chiropractor or massage appointment. To be a kid again.

Go Ahead and Jump

URBAN COWBOY

WHERE THE uninitiated see a concrete wall, a metal railing and a row of benches, Igor Keselman sees opportunity. Keselman, 21, might run up the side of the wall, vault the railing in a single bound and then hop between benches like a frog traveling over lily pads. He practices parkour, an extreme sport where the playing field is the city itself. "Parkour is about using your body to go over, under and around obstacles as efficiently as possible," he says. "A mailbox and a building overhang become things you can jump on."

Based on obstacle courses used in French military training, parkour is a subculture as much as a physical discipline, says Keselman, who immigrated to Newton at age 4 and teaches gymnastics there. People who do parkour are traceurs—their movements trace a trail through an area. When a bunch of traceurs get together, they're "jamming." Keselman belongs to New England Parkour, a group of about 250 traceurs. Their favorite jamming spots include Josiah Quincy Elementary School in Chinatown, Harvard Square and Northeastern University's Centennial Common.

Real traceurs don't compete or show off their skills, he explains. They focus on perfecting their technique and building their confidence. That approach also helps them avoid injuries, Keselman says, though he admits to taking risks—like leaping across the gaps between rooftops. "That's something I don't recommend people do. It's silly, dangerous. But I'm not saying I haven't done it." JOHN DYER

Drink of the Moment

All Lit Up

It's time to decorate at Chez Henri. Rob Kraemer, here on his day off, wearily eyes the lights as Paul O'Connell spins a tale of a previous evening's cheer: drinks, dancing and the fleeting temptation to kidnap another establishment's bartenders.

"No, I have my own secret best bartender here—this guy," the owner says with a nod to Kraemer.

Honesty and teamwork—it's what Kraemer has brought to his 12 years behind the bar at Chez Henri, either by lending a hand with the wreaths or seeking opinions for his creations. "The servers are overly nice, but the kitchen guys will let you know, 'Oh, this sucks,'" he observes. "They taste stuff. That's what they do, so they have a better sense of what works than I do."

And the cooks like Kraemer's Lamplighter ($9), a mix of Wild Turkey, celery and lemon juices, and simple syrup. The concoction appeared after O'Connell purchased a kitchen gadget. "Paul bought this badass German juicer," Kraemer raves. "You can juice sticks with it." A safe bet that was never taste-tested.

In the Lamplighter, equilibrium is key. None of the components nudge the drink off the deep end. "For me, a non-bourbon drinker, it's accessible without hiding the dominant spirit," Kraemer explains. The whiskey is cloaked in juices—present but protected. "It achieves a balance, which I think a cocktail should have, as much, if not more, than tasting good." Which it does, honest. NICK ALTSCHULLER

Question for Ken Feil

What are some feel-good movies for winter?

Feil is a film scholar in residence at Emerson College.

1. The Day After Tomorrow: This is a movie about the effects of global warming. The scene where New York is iced over is so beautiful, it kind of makes you think, "Wow, they have it a lot worse than we do."

2. Edward Scissorhands: A bittersweet, beautiful film that begins and ends with the image of falling snow. It's a nice one for balancing winter blues when things are looking down.

3. Last Holiday: The underrated remake starring Queen Latifah is charming, and the scenes in the Czech Republic are beautiful shots of winter. It satisfies wishful filmmaking because the main character is such a small person who comes into her own.

4. Gremlins: The ultimate anti–feel-good movie. The creatures are perfect parodies of what people do during Christmastime.

5. The Family Stone: Underrated, touching and well-acted: This film has such a great cast with Sarah Jessica Parker, Rachel McAdams, Diane Keaton and Claire Danes. It's a really wonderful script that sounds terrible. But it works great on-screen. KYLE WRIGHT

Good Eats

Fish Food

Tony Maws looks happy as a pig, trolling around his state-of-the-art kitchen at Craigie on Main and perusing the menu with its heavy porcine presence. That said, the dish that left us squealing with delight this month has its roots in a sustainable fishery in Ireland and showcases one of the chef's new toys: a CVap. Maws describes the appliance as a cross between "a convection oven and a steamer," its sous-vide effect rendering the salmon-colored Irish sea trout completely cooked, yet meltingly tender. He finishes the dish with shrimp and mussels, an almond milk–based broth with sea urchins and a ginger salad. It's seasoned perfectly, of course, with Serrano ham. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Low Alcohol Content

'Tis the season to shed December's extra padding. If you don't want to sacrifice wine, look for options with less alcohol, the main source of calories. Average alcohol content today hovers between 12 and 14 percent, but there are some delicious wines far below those levels. Welcome 2009 with the three described here. At least until you're back in fighting shape.

Quinta da Aveleda, Vinho Verde, Portugal, 2006 ($8, Huntington Wine & Spirits, Boston)
Vinho verde is a light-bodied, refreshing wine that dominates production in the cool northwestern corner of Portugal. Yet, it's almost a secret in the United States outside of ethnic enclaves. This is a family-owned, estate-bottled gem that's slightly spritzy, with a lemony, peachy, tart-apple flavor. Sleek in body, it's great with ceviche or fried fish.

Karl Molitor, Hattenheimer Riesling Kabinett, Rheingau Germany, 2006 ($14, Winestone, Chestnut Hill)
German riesling isn't only one of the most amazing wines in the world, with an often startling bouquet and delicate, pure-acid structure, it's also among the lowest in alcohol concentration. The Germans themselves are gravitating toward options with less sugar nowadays, but the U.S. market prefers ever-increasing quantities of those with apricot, citrus and sweet-spice notes. This bargain-priced riesling has a brightness that pairs nicely with chicken- or fish-salad.

Michele Chiarlo, Moscato d'Asti "Nivole," Piedmont, Italy, 2007 ($13, Bauer Wine & Spirits, Boston)
Extremely low in alcohol (7 percent) and discernibly sweet, this semi-sparkling wine is a versatile crowd-pleaser that works well with salty, slightly spicy and, unsurprisingly, sweet flavors. In addition, it comes in a handsome 375 ml. bottle that makes a nice low-calorie dessert gift. Nivole has a brilliant peach and lilac perfume, with just enough liveliness to leave your palate cleansed and tingling.

Master of Wine Sandy Block is vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods.

RETURN OF THE HALF-PINT

"A lot of people are still upset," says manager Paddy Grace, referencing the rants against gentrification on the Internet after the Littlest Bar shut its doors. "I didn't realize people thought so much of it until I had to close."

Pushed aside for a tower of condos, the 400-square-foot saloon poured its last pint in 2006 after 61 years. This new iteration a few blocks east aims for the same charm, but in larger proportions. "That's the first thing they say—'It's not that little'—but they like it," adds Grace, 71.

There are nostalgic touches: the old photos of Ray Flynn or Muhammed Ali brandishing a hurling stick, the stubby old bar embedded in the longer new one. Then there are the modern concessions, like three bathrooms. "People say, 'Oh my God, you've come a long way,' but there was no room in the other place," he cries. "We were lucky to have a damn toilet!"

The dining options have changed as well. "I used to sell smoked trout between two slices of bread," he explains. "That was the menu. Otherwise you brought your own." Nowadays, there's pub grub like shepherd's pie ($10) and burgers in "littlest" ($4.50) and "not so little" ($9) varieties.

The challenge for the bar will be regaining its sense of place. But even with the flat screens, a skeleton of brick and beams keeps it anchored in the Old World. "This is a Bulfinch-preserved building," Grace says. "It's got character and history to it, and if you stand across the street and look, you wonder, 'How did this building last so long?' Cause they can't touch it." NICK ALTSCHULLER

FASHION FORWARD

The last thing a guy wants to do before exercising is get all dressed up. Workout gear shouldn't be fussy or matchy-matchy (banish those tracksuits). But a beer-stained T and muscle pants don't send the right message, either. It's easy enough to upgrade your look, beginning with a basic gym bag and bottoms. Then add the latest in sneaker technology and a cool gadget. You'll no longer have to sprint home from the gym. Unless that's your thing. KYLE WRIGHT

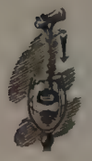
STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.



Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

Nick and Choose { NICK ALTSCHULLER }

KING ME

Nick goes medieval.

FOR YEARS, I'D SEEN THE Medieval Manor as I drove down I-93. It's a roadside curiosity like a hitchhiker or a hooker—sooner or later, you've got to pull over and ask for directions.

Since 1972, the Medieval Manor has promised a raunchy romp through the Middle Ages. I'm all for bawdy humor, but I've never been one for the classics. In school we read The Canterbury Tales, a text pretty much designed for the teenage boy—all farts and sex. I found it mind-numbing. Even the kids who made swords out of PVC piping were bored.

However, I appreciated the tome's enthusiasm for ale. And as my friends and I settled into our communal table on a blustery winter's night, we were delighted to learn from our "primary beer wench" that flagons came in both light and dark varieties: Busch Light or Michelob Amber Bock. OK, so there's no mead on tap. Authenticity isn't what you're paying for, a point hammered home when the court jester introduced himself with a penguin masturbation joke and our wench removed the lid from our appetizer: medieval pita pizza.

As we merrily crunched away, the festivities began with a rousing guitar number from the minstrel Bill. (The jester calls himself Squeegee and there's an oaf named Sponge, but apparently Bill is a proud man.) The show proceeds in stages, as the cast, led by a king dressed regally in black tights, performs songs and skits until it's time to eat another course with your bare hands. After a winning spot of repartee concerning the queen's butt, faux dragon soup was ladled from a metal bucket.

"They didn't have celery in the Middle Ages," said my friend Casey, suddenly looking for historical accuracy as Squeegee referenced the iPod.

"How do you know?" I whispered.

"I was an art history minor."

Oh, well there's no arguing that. Please, have some more of the dark.

It's all a bit ridiculous, but supping from my own bowl, I found it easy to tumble into the revelry. Save for a group of stone-faced dunces in the front row sipping pink lemonade and looking like serfs who'd lost their cows to famine, we all were getting into the spirit. The king decreed, "Eat, drink and be merry," and we obeyed.

Still, it's not all frivolity. The show hits a low point when the wenches gather for an anti-war ballad. If anything, it could have used a sword fight or two. But the formula must be working, as the content and the cast rarely change. I can't commit to a channel, yet here's a man who's spent 19 years as Squeegee, a man who smiled as he shared a post-performance beer with his king and accepted a pickled thanks from us.

"I liked our wench," said my friend Adam later, as we discussed the show's merits. "I would recommend it, as a Bostonian, as something to knock off your checklist. But I was looking forward to hearing the old English arts, thys and thous. That was my one letdown."

I found the omission a blessing and hereby decree: If Chaucer isn't your thing, the Medieval Manor might be. ✖✖✖

THE KINDNESS OF STRANGERS

TO THE EQUINOX CAB DRIVER: On Dec. 19, my sister, her four girlfriends and I were on a mission to celebrate [her] 25th birthday at Faneuil Hall. This should've been an easy task. However, Boston was hit with a snowstorm that day. At last call, we stepped outside wearing high heels and dresses and realized the weather had turned for the worst with no cabs in sight. Tears began to flow, legs turned red and numb, and yelling about what to do ensued. Then you pulled up beside me in your Equinox and asked where I was headed. I told you Southie, and you simply said, "Get in." We all gladly jumped into a car with you, a perfect stranger. You saved our toes from frostbite and allowed the birthday celebrations to remain unspoiled. Thank you and have a great holiday!

The desperate birthday crew

To the mailman (or woman) who found my car keys on the corner of Beacon and Charles streets and shipped them to Shaw's:

Thank you so much. Who knew when I applied for a rewards card and stuck it on my keychain in my freshman year of college, [I'd] benefit in such a way? I had to have my spare key sent to me, but you saved me from spending hundreds of dollars to buy a new backup set. I'd also like to give a shout-out to Shaw's, who still had my cell phone on record—I will forever purchase groceries at your store.

The girl whose faith in humanity is temporarily restored

To all radio DJs, especially that oldies station:

I don't want to be a grinch in this time of fruitcakes and sugar-plum fairies, but please guys, can we chill with the holiday music? It seems like it started a bit earlier than usual this year. Even before Thanksgiving, you were filling my brain with images of falling snowflakes and children's choirs! Is it possible that one person, one Christmas nut, actually possesses this much freakin' holiday spirit? I don't think so. So I'd say unless it's Christmas Eve or Christmas Day, don't play "Jingle Bells" in Spanish or "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town" performed by golden retrievers! Save my sanity and maybe some of my Christmas spirit [for next year].

OUT OF THE BLUE

Sky-colored stones adorn winter's prettiest jewelry. You'll find plenty of delicate designs, plus a few dramatic styles, decorated with gems ranging from soft aquamarine to bright-blue topaz. There's also a wealth of wallet-friendly options made with colored crystals. RUTH BASLOE

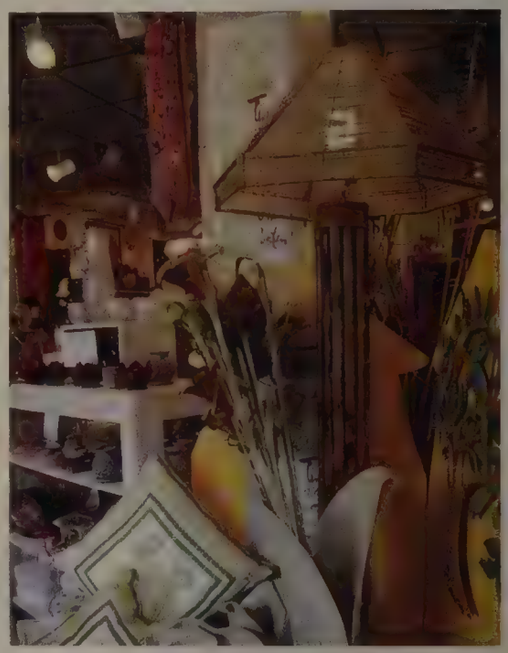
GIFTED



A talented parrot and handmade presents

No Bird Brain

MOVE OVER, brainy apes. The famous parrot in Alex and Me dazzlingly demonstrates skills usually seen as the domain of humans and chimps. Author Irene Pepperberg is a scientist who worked with Alex for nearly 30 years. Way beyond wanting a cracker, he acquired almost 100 words and developed a surprising ability to identify shapes and colors. Given a series of plastic numbers, for example, and asked, "What color is three?" he could answer, "Blue." Questioned further about those items, he could classify their differences as "color" or "shape." Alex astonished Pepperberg by saying, "None," when a number she asked about wasn't there. The bird could be imperious, ironic, bossy, a jokester: "No, you tell me what shape!" "Pick up nut!" And, along with his astonishing vocabulary and reasoning skills, he was clearly affectionate and loving (date-seeking singles take note). Through many universities, including MIT's hip Media Lab, Pepperberg persisted in teaching, publicizing and adoring her guy. His final not-just-parroted words to her were: "You be good. I love you."

In Alex and Me, Irene Pepperberg recounts her relationship with her celebrity parrot at Brandeis, Harvard and MIT.

IT TAKES A VILLAGE SUPPORT GLOBAL ARTISANS.

All's Fair

TEN THOUSAND VILLAGES has a good heart in its pocketbook, operating as a fair-trade company that gives artisans a percentage up-front and the balance upon sale. Handmade items from Africa, Asia and South America are arrayed gracefully and soothingly in areas organized by color. Red woven baskets sit next to affordable, red painted tables that seem prepped for an elegant house. In the shades-of-brown corner, what looks like an arrestingly off-kilter ladder is actually a bamboo CD holder. Nearby, a bunny-shaped pot constructed of plant fiber charms. Toys here are blessedly different from the mass-produced ones: An alphabet of connected pieces forms a long, slithering alligator; tenderly knitted stuffed-animals evoke a prettier, sweeter world. Also, you'll find elephant bookends—suggestive of distant locales—and Coke cans dissected to become little standing characters. Then there are bowls made of shells so ethereally thin they might float off to heaven. Everything is natural, ingenious and artistic.

Ten Thousand Villages (694 Mass. Ave., Cambridge, 617-876-2414; 226 Harvard St., Brookline, 617-277-7700) sells handmade artifacts from around the world.

Oh Soy Beef might be what's for dinner on most tables. Which is too bad because tofu has its merits, too. The silky slabs of soy—best known as the budget protein in Asian stir-fries at dinner—taste great scrambled with eggs at breakfast, curried and piled on rolls at lunch, and blended into milkshakes at dessert. The secret? Freshness. Just like cheese, the finest curds are made locally like those from Jamaica Plain's own 21st Century Foods. ELIZABETH BOMZE

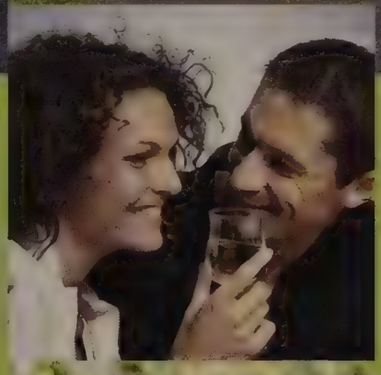
AHEAD OF THE CURVE

The latest roundup...

AFTER PRICEY renovations, Circle: Plates and Lounge opened in October with a splashy menu featuring foie gras with brined plums, lavender gel and brioche, a French wine list and a roster of swanky cocktails. But less than two months later, the eatery circled the drain and closed its Columbus Avenue location, formerly home to Bob's Southern Bistro. Even in the restaurant biz, that's one short life cycle. Could it be a sign of things to come in these recessionary times?

Maybe. At the least, it's a sign of poor planning, says one industry insider: "The South End needed a new French restaurant with a French wine list like a hole in the head." In a neighborhood with such faves as Hamersley's Bistro, Aquitaine, Mistral and Petit Robert Bistro, Circle faced stiff competition.



THERE'S NO NEED TO LOSE faith in upscale dining if you've got deep enough pockets, however. That's apparently the rationale behind the January opening of Sensing in the Fairmont Battery Wharf Hotel on the waterfront. Designed by renowned French gastonome Guy Martin and helmed by his protégé, Gerard Barbin, Sensing boasts an open kitchen, chef's table and seasonal outdoor seating.

TRANSCENDING SEASONAL and financial boundaries is an affordable indulgence at ice-cream maven Wheeler Del Torro's new vegan cafe on Mass. Ave. near Symphony Hall. Free Wi-Fi, a "loitering-friendly" policy and a mozzarella sandwich are all draws, but it's the customized-beyond-belief mainstay that boggles the mind. Some Asian clients, Del Torro says, fly him to their home country to create ice cream with "aphrodisiac" ingredients. He enjoys a challenge but, in keeping with his vegan standards, has refused "requests for tiger penis."

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH JACKSON CANNON }

TAKE A SIP

Creativity flows at Drink.

BOTTOM'S UP Jackson Cannon samples the cocktails and nibbles at Drink.

RULE NO. 1 WHEN DRINKING with an experienced bartender, don't try to keep up. Rule No. 2: If someone starts pouring Chartreuse, refer to Rule No. 1. Rule No. 3: Step away from the flaming cocktails.

I willingly broke all three rules at Drink, where I met Eastern Standard's bespectacled bar manager and cocktail guru, Jackson Cannon, who arrived looking dapper in his signature suspenders and button-down shirt. Considering the popularity of mixology these days, Barbara Lynch's Fort Point venture seemed as noteworthy as a new restaurant. On first glance, it appeared to be more theater than alcohol establishment. There were no bottles, mirrors, kitschy signs or even drink menus. Instead, the snaking white bar was dotted with vintage glassware, beaker-like pitchers and an herb garden.

Servers encouraged guests to tap into the house expertise and to describe what they fancied (either a classic cocktail or an idea of one, like bourbon and citrus). Cannon took charge ordering us "old-fashioned Old Fashioneds" ($10). Our drinks came in rocks glasses, each stacked with two fist-sized ice cubes, which were sculpted from a 50-pound block of ice sitting at one of end of the bar. They contained muddled Angostura bitters, water and a sugar cube, mixed with Cognac (substituting a more traditional liquor for today's popular base, whiskey). "Cognac and whiskey are really close," he explained. "It's true that the grains are the same in some respects, but aging in oak changes the flavor perspective, giving rye a real Americana accent."

Self-educated, Cannon often launches into encyclopedic liquor rambles. It's easy to forget he started out as a musician, graduating from Berklee before touring with the Tarbox Ramblers and other blues peformers. "I slept on floors from Berlin to L.A.," he recalled. But always a drinks man, he eventually got into bartending, hopping from the West Side Lounge to then-open Rouge in the South End.

Cannon was working at the Lizard Lounge when he met Eastern Standard proprietor Garrett Harker. They bonded over a common frustration with boxed margarita mixes and together set up the ES bar so that "the kitchen would be behind [it] at all times."

We stopped chatting and ordered the Vieux Carré ($10) for our next round; it's a quintessential New Orleans cocktail that mixes Cognac, rye, Peychaud's bitters, sweet vermouth and Benedictine. Stiffer than the first, this one managed to go down faster. Determined to keep up, I insisted we order food from the small menu of affordable appetizers. Our bartender suggested the savory arlette with prosciutto, honey and Gruyère ($8) with a spot-on description: "sort of like a savory ice-cream sandwich with a ham-and-cheese crust." The partially frozen, sweet-custard filling melted as soon as it hit our tongues, causing Cannon to bug out. "Seriously, that will rock your world." The crêpe gâteau ($10), a cocktail party canapé of smoked sable fish, trout roe and chive, was cut into two tiny rectangular bites, while the potato crisps ($5) were crispy with a sprig of basil buried inside and piled with chilled parmesan shavings.

Bar manager John Gertsen, who conceived Drink with Lynch, came over to swap stories with Cannon before pulling out measuring devices and squeeze bottles. "Do you know what he's making?" I asked Cannon who had a wicked grin on his face.

Krakatoa

"Yeah. It's rather dangerous enough that he wanted to come over and make sure it was done right," he said. Gertsen's staff dropped what they were doing and gathered around as he carefully measured various liquids including a long pour of green Chartreuse. He then lit an orange peel on fire and dropped it in the glass causing a brief, blue flame to lick up the sides.

"This is the Krakatoa ($10), which is a variation of a Turano. It's a strong one so go slow," Gertsen said, placing two flat-bottomed Champagne flutes filled with a potent, amber liquor in front of us. One sip and I could feel the Chartreuse in my toes. This, I thought, could be as earth-shattering as its namesake volcano. And true to form, things got fuzzy after that first taste. I do remember Gertsen taking away our empty glasses a half hour later.

"How about a couple shots of Fernet-Branca?" Cannon smiled, sliding his mug over to make room for the digestif. And that's when he taught me Rule No. 4: No matter how much your head is swimming, there's always room for Fernet. ✖✖✖

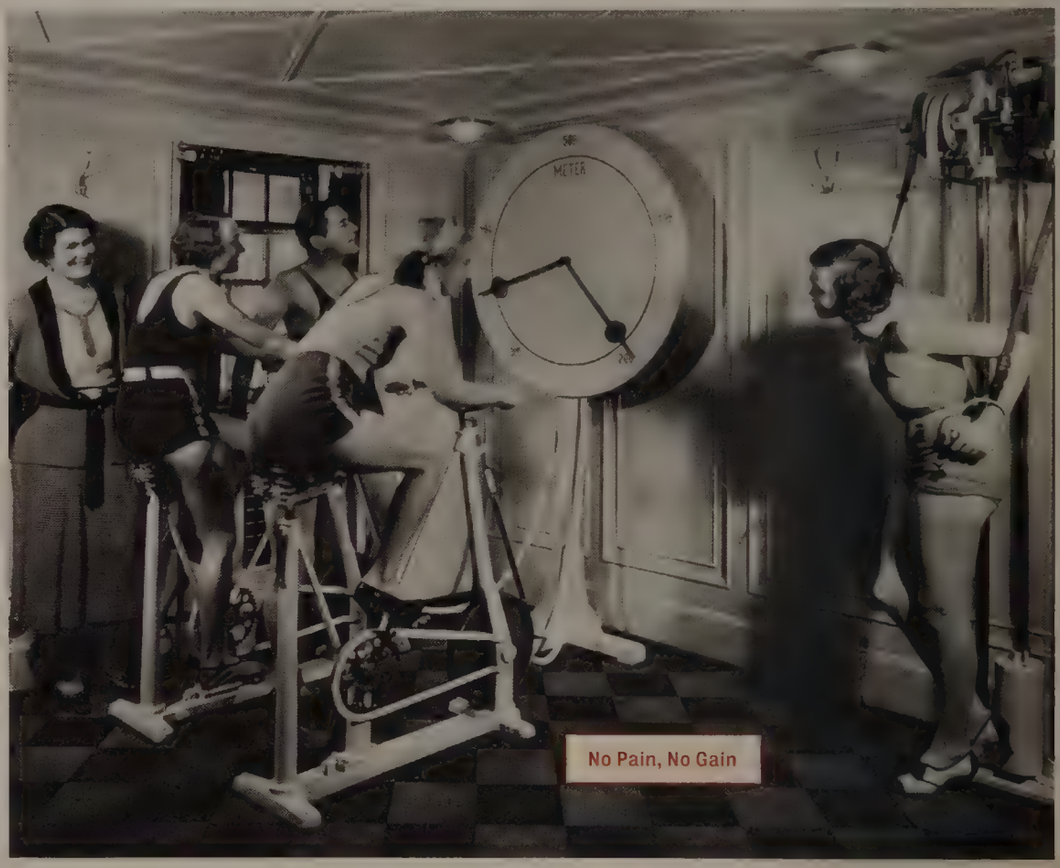
WEIGHT UP

Personal training is the gift that keeps on giving.



MY WIFE, HEATHER, AND I have a theory when it comes to presents: The best gift you can get people is something that they'd never buy for themselves. And Heather has definitely taken that strategy to heart, because for my birthday, she got me five personal-training sessions. Great—my birthday present is to get screamed at by some angry meathead, like that trainer dude from The Biggest Loser, what's-his-name… Jillian.

There are many reasons why I've never pursued personal training. Throughout college and for several years thereafter, I always had buddies around to spot me and yell a bit of encouragement at the gym. So getting a trainer is admitting I've reached the point where I have to pay someone to be my friend. This must be what Michael Jackson feels like all the time.

There's also an element of male ego behind my resistance. Guys shouldn't need anyone to tell them how to lift weights. It should be instinctual. I'll bet my idol, Bear Grylls, doesn't have a personal trainer (despite recent injuries). He just hikes into the desert and makes a pec machine from rocks and a camel carcass. He figures it out. That's what I try to do, too. Which is why people at the gym are always asking, "Hey, how'd you get so jacked?" and "Hey, why are you trying to bench-press that elliptical machine? That lady is using it."

For the past 15 years or so, I've pursued my own weight-training regimen. If you're interested in learning my technique, find a mirror that shows you from the waist up. Then work on the muscles you can see reflected. Since you can't see your back, you don't need to work on it. Ditto with legs. Abs are kind of optional, too. Actually, just do some curls, and you're all set. It's all about the guns. I can't imagine why Heather thought I might need advice on any of this, because it's pretty simple.

At my first session, I tell my trainer, Dave, about my workout history. "You really never do any weight training on your legs?" he asks. I reply that it would anger God to tamper with anything that came out so damn perfect in the first place. Also, I don't want to have to buy new pants. "OK, we'll do some legs," he says. And back. And other muscles that I can't see and thus don't care about.

There's no screaming and flexing in the mirror. At least, not until I get home.

Over the next two weeks, Dave introduces me to a number of new and punishing exercises: lunges, dumbbell flies, "Arnold presses"—so named because they were invented by a certain state governor. It's all searing pain and lingering soreness for days afterward. In fact, if I lived in California, I might vote against Schwarzenegger purely on the basis of Arnold presses. Dave, for his part, never screams or head-butts the squat rack or says, "Chug some Hydroxycut and then hit the tan booth, bro!" He just offers quiet encouragement, and I try to do what he says. There's no screaming and flexing in the mirror. At least, not until I get home.

And I've got to say, Dave knows his stuff. My legs feel good, and I haven't had to trade my jeans for Zubaz pants. In another month, I'm going to have shoulders like a Chinese gymnast. And in two months, I'm going to have shoulders like a male Chinese gymnast. I'm so impressed with the results that I sign up for another round of training—this time of my own volition.

So, personal training turned out to be a successful gift. But should it have offended me that Heather essentially ordered me to get in better shape? Not really, because, like most guys, I can look at my round gut and skinny arms and know I look great. So there are no hard feelings. Would the Taj Mahal be pissed if someone suggested a few more rubies on one of its spires? No, it would say, "Good call. That would make me look even more awesome." And if you think I'm earnestly comparing my body to the Taj Mahal, I assure you I'm not. My body is now way more impressive than the Taj Mahal. And whiter.

Besides, if I don't get offended about this, then Heather can't get offended about her birthday gift. And she's won't even have to go to the gym. She'll have to go to the hospital. I'm pretty sure a boob job is one of those things she never would've bought for herself. ✖✖✖

FEEL THE LOVE

Some resolutions for our favorite sports pals

EVERY YEAR I RESOLVE TO make my family and friends happy. For 2009, I'm extending those well wishes to my associates in the sports world (and a few of my media pals, too). Here are 50 hopes for 50 people:

For...

Dustin Pedroia: a shortstop who can be his double-play buddy for the next 10 years.

Josh Beckett: a return to his form in 2007, when he earned 20 wins and a much-deserved first CY Young Award.

David Ortiz: health, which will enable the greatest clutch hitter in Red Sox history to have a few more post-season walk-offs.

Jason Varitek: a contract that allows him to retire on his terms, as a Red Sox player.

Kevin Youkilis: a body cast to protect his frame from another season of too many brushbacks.

Jacoby Ellsbury: with Coco sent packing, the comfort we saw during the 2007 playoffs. Oh yeah, and more free tacos.

Manny Ramirez: a brain that functions in a dual capacity, so he's not just the best hitter of our time but also a good teammate—albeit somewhere else.

Jim Rice: a place in Cooperstown. He deserves it.

Dennis Eckersley: a Hall of Fame golf game to go along with his Hall of Fame work as one of the best baseball analysts in the country.

Theo Epstein: more Pedroias, Youkilises, Ellsburys and Mastersons. I love the kids he keeps bringing in.

Tom Brady: a minimal amount of scar tissue in the knee and a return to the Patriots huddle this summer.

Bill Belichick: a big running back who can carry the freight 25 times a game. Basically, another Corey Dillon.

Kevin Faulk: some credit. This guy is more special than we realize.

Rodney Harrison: another chance to play 16 games in the regular season, a few more in January and then one big one in early February before calling it quits.

Larry Izzo: more recognition for giving us 13 great years.

Mark Bavaro: a spot on The New York Times Best Sellers list for his new book, Rough and Tumble—a riveting novel about the NFL.

Michael Ivins/Boston Red Sox

Ben Watson: a tape of Bavaro in action, so that he can see how tight ends should really play the game.

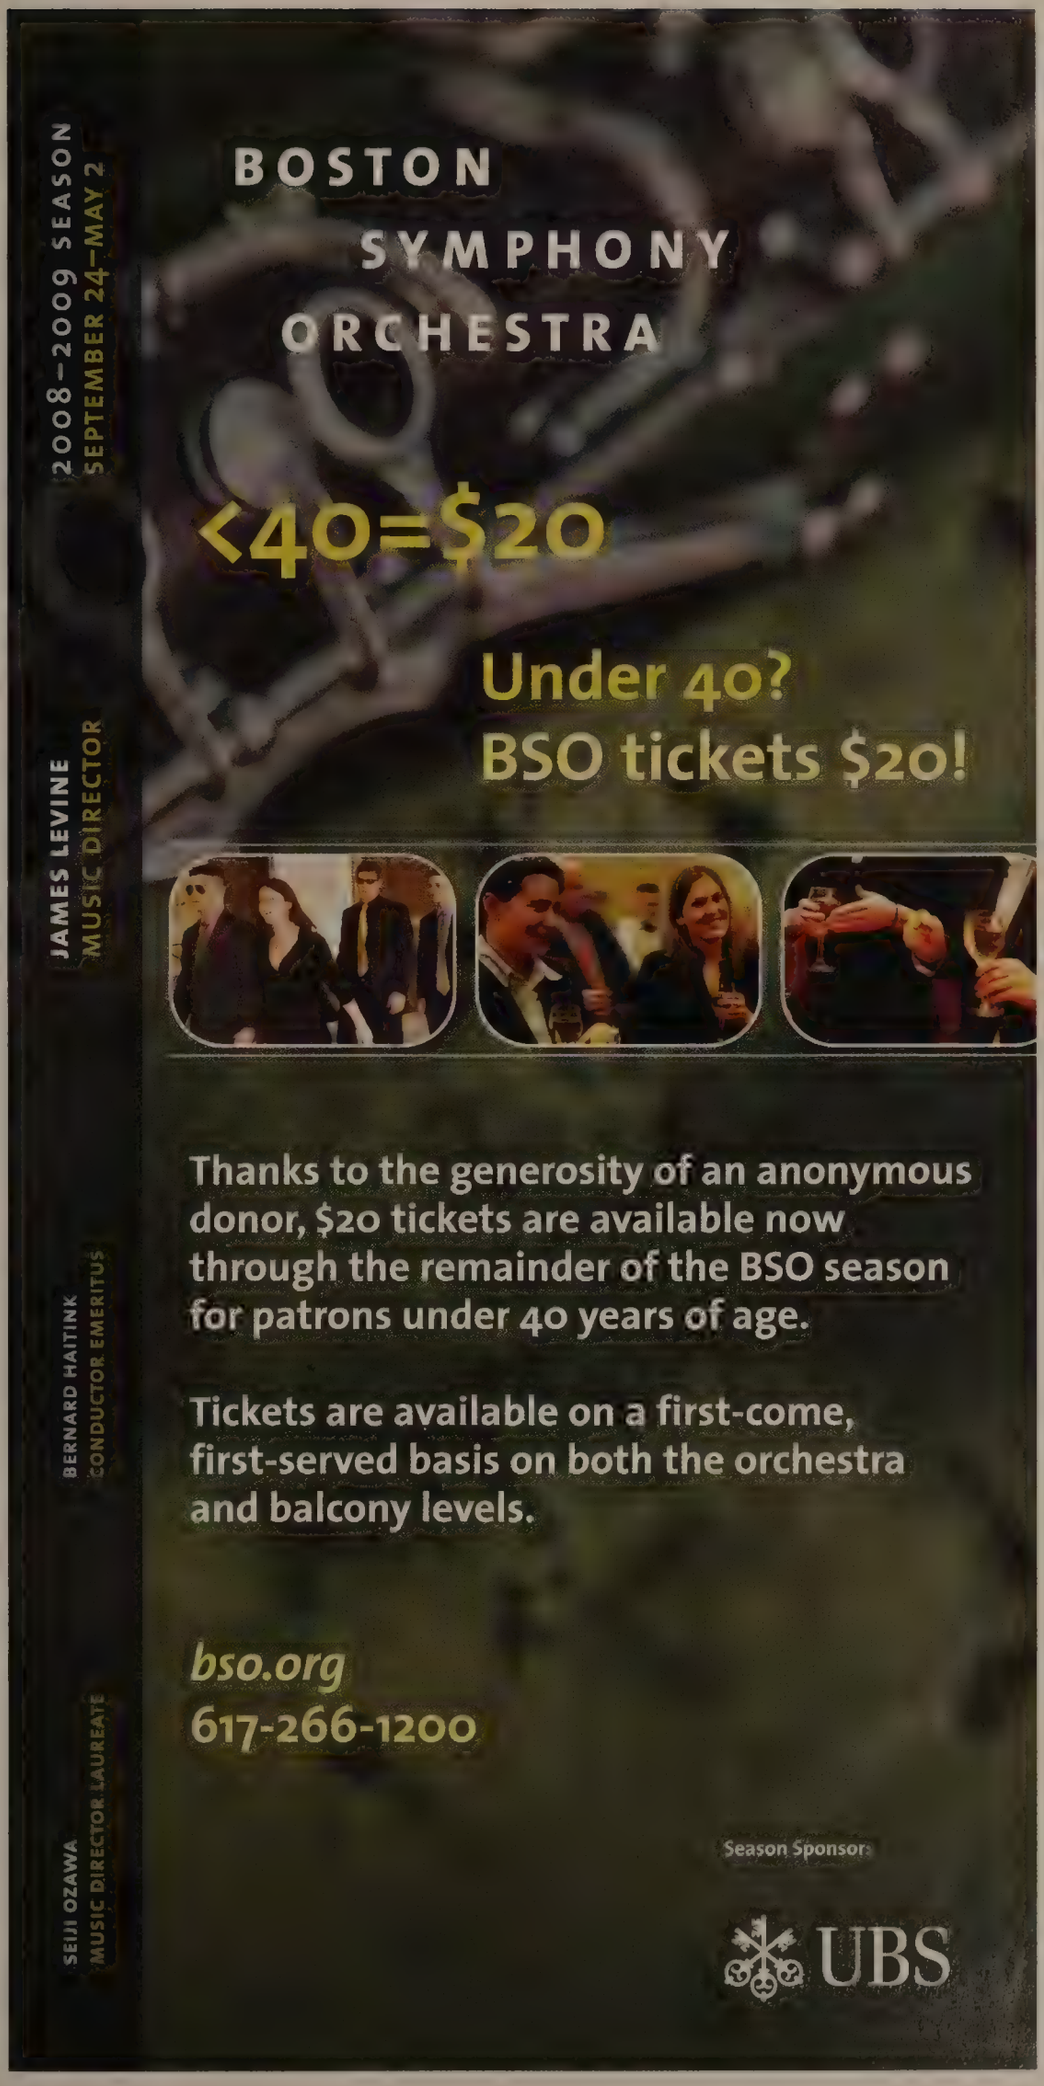
Ellis Hobbs: a trip to the Pro Bowl. He's been special on special teams.

Jerod Mayo: the role as defensive team leader.

Ted Johnson: peace in his life after football.

Junior Seau: 20 more years of NFL service. For some people, there's no such thing as life after football.

Scott Zolak: a future quarterback in his family to go along with his two beautiful girls.



Charlie Weis: many counted blessings for that 10-year deal he was granted much too early at Notre Dame.

Robert Kraft: no more mentions of Spygate.

Brennan Williams: the same road his dad, former Patriot defensive lineman Brent Williams, took—a strong college career followed by many years in Foxboro.

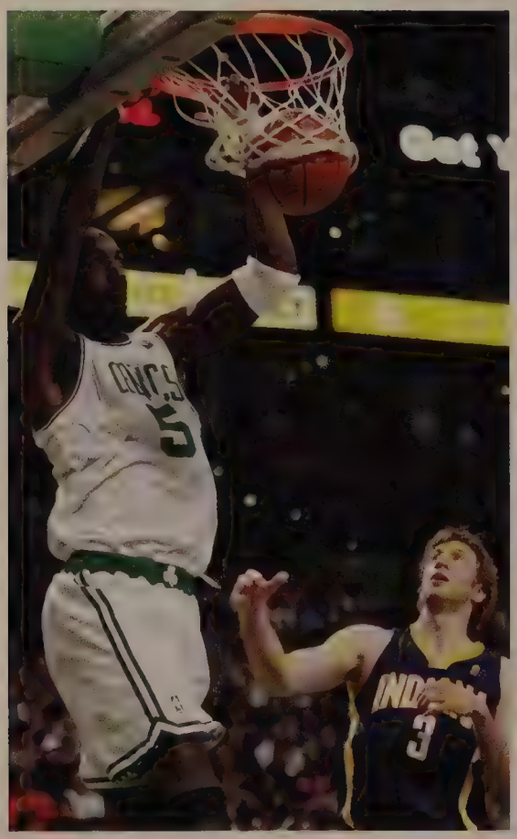
Kevin Garnett: more sit-downs with Bill Russell after, of course, another title.
Rajon Rondo: a chance to hang out with pals KG, the Truth and Ray at an All-Star game.
Paul Pierce: a mention or two of his teammates during next season's opening speech.
Leon Powe: the NBA's Sixth Man Award. The guy exemplifies team play.
PJ Brown: another call from Danny Ainge requesting his much-needed services during the stretch run.
Danny Ainge: his No. 44 retired. I believe the owner promised and Danny delivered.
Doc Rivers: for son Jeremiah to put on the Indiana Hoosiers uniform and play just like Isaiah Thomas did—on the court.
Phil Kessel: a 50-goal season. Yes, he's that good.
Claude Julien: props for finding a way to motivate Kessel and the franchise in general.
Peter Chiarelli: praise for holding strong and not trading Kessel.
Ken Hodge: the same as Ainge. He was one of the best Bruins of his era and deserves to have No. 8 up in the rafters.
Tim Thomas: respect. I am a believer. He's a real No. 1 goalie.
Zdeno Chara: a little more help on the blue line and maybe a little of Mark Savard's fire.
Taylor Twellman: a shot at taking his scoring skills to the Premier League for a few million English pounds per year.
Steve Nichol: his own TV show. The Revs coach may be the best sound bite in all of sports.
Jerry York: another Mighty Might for the Boston College hockey coach—one who can follow the footsteps of Brian Gionta and Nathan Gerbe.
Gene DeFilippo: one more damn win to finally get Boston College football a BCS bowl bid.
John DiBiaso: three years of son Jonathan quarterbacking his Everett High team to Super Bowls.
John Casey: 500 career wins as the Jumbos' baseball general.
Mike Gibson: real progress teaching me the game of golf at the Harmon club.
Andy Wong: another 58 years of hosting Boston's pro athletes at the Kowloon on Route 1 in Saugus.
Chet Curtis: for his new knee to get better and his 40-yard dash time to return to 4.4.
Jim Braude: no more international incidents and, of course, my wedding gift.
Greg Lee: a sports editor job at one of our nation's elite papers.
Georgia Collins: a brother for Savannah the Great.
Everyone else: A wonderful 2009. Be cool. ✖✖✖



TAKE 5

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON PENNY, PERKINS RICKEY AND RICKY

5 CELTIC STORYLINES

Cleaning House... If there's a mess on the floor and no vacuum handy, a DustBuster can serve as a pretty solid replacement. Clean up enough tiny spills, and you start thinking, "Wait a second! This DustBuster's smaller, cheaper and does the same thing! Who needs a vacuum?" Then a bag of flour bursts all over the kitchen... Craaaap! James Posey was the Celtics vacuum, Tony Allen is the DustBuster and the 1-3 road trip was the flour. Discuss.

KG in the clutch... Although they might miss Posey down the stretch, the Celtics have benefited from Kevin Garnett's upgraded crunch-time presence. The man who shied away from the big shot last May in Atlanta has been replaced by a beast who's not only willing to take the big one, but wants to.

Front and centers... Imagine Kendrick Perkins and Greg Oden standing before you; now choose one as your starting center for the next three seasons. Who's your pick? If you spent even five seconds contemplating the answer, then our point is made.

Go to the Pru... Other than Eddie House, the second unit's outside shooting leaves much to be desired—especially since Big Baby's adopted Chuck Person's conscience. But sitting at the end of the bench, warm-ups still intact, is a second-year shooter who can extend the D and handle the ball to boot. Let the Gabe Pruitt Campaign officially begin!

Shooting Starbury... Regardless of the C's record, Danny Ainge is sure to add another player or two by winter's end. And while Joe Smith's our first choice, the prospect of Stephon Marbury in green is still somewhat intriguing. After all, nothing says "team" like an Ubuntu tattoo on the forehead.

1 ONE SHOCKING MOMENT

We were relaxing at home when the unbelievable scrolled across ESPN's Bottom Line: "Ricky Davis suspended for violating NBA drug policy." Really? That Ricky Davis? Man, just when you think you know somebody... We haven't been this shocked since Clay Aiken came out of the closet.

2 OFFSEASON SIGNINGS

For your thoughts... Last month, after the Sox announced the addition of pitcher Brad Penny, the reception in Red Sox Nation was lukewarm at best—and we're not sure why. Penny may be on the downside of his career, but he's also a two-time All-Star with a solid postseason résumé. Not to mention the possibility that old flame Alyssa Milano starts popping up at Fenway. That gasp you just heard came from the Track Girls' office on Herald Street.

Oh Henry... In the moments after Mark Teixeira signed in the Bronx, Sox owner John Henry e-mailed the AP to declare that the Yankees had "leaped away" from Boston financially. Our only question is whether Henry composed the message from his Florida mansion, Brookline palace, yacht or private jet.

3 Parts Pats Potpourri

As the Knee Turns... Here's the one certainty about Tom Brady's injury: Nobody knows anything about Tom Brady's injury—or at least nobody's who's talking. Maybe he'll miss the start of 2009, maybe he'll be stronger than ever, maybe he needs a baboon knee replacement. Who knows? The truth won't come out until the summer, so don't get caught up in the offseason hype.

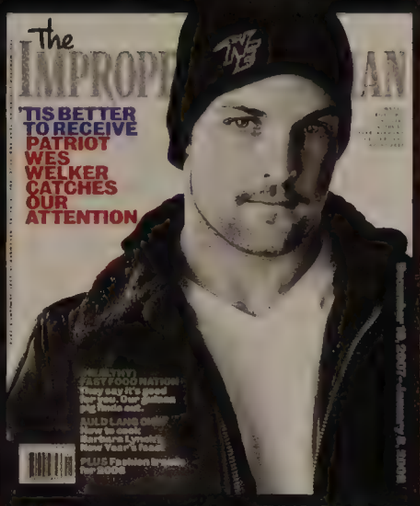
It's been a while... With Romeo Crennel and Eric Mangini collecting unemployment, and Charlie Weis deserving of the same fate in South Bend, we couldn't help but fantasize about a potential young-dynasty reunion. Hey, maybe they wouldn't work as well together on the field, but the foursome at least deserves some consideration if Touchstone ever greenlights Wild Hogs 2. That'd be comedy gold.

The envelope, please... And the nominees for "Performance That, in Retrospect, Might Have Killed New England's Season" are: Jabar Gaffney in "Oopsy! Was I Supposed to Catch That?"; Ben Watson in "Who Says You Have to Get Hit to Fumble?"; and Bill Belichick in "Timeouts? Who Needs Timeouts?" And the winner is...

4 DATES TO WATCH

1/9 The Celtics take on the Cavs in a battle for Eastern Conference supremacy. A look into our crystal ball shows the start of this one delayed 20 minutes after Delonte West and Anderson Varejao get their afros tangled in a pre-game chest bump. Says Doc Rivers: "Why don't you just play with six guys on the court? Apparently that's legal now."

1/12 The Baseball Writer's Association of America announces the Hall of Fame Class of 2009, and we'd like to be the first to congratulate Rickey Henderson on his monumental achievement. But unfortunately, we're too late—Henderson's already been congratulating himself for the last two months. "Rickey's very proud of you, Rickey."



1/13 The second-place Montreal Canadiens are in town for a showdown with the division-leading Bruins. We like the B's chances, as long as Claude Julien fights off the last-minute impulse to scratch Phil Kessel.

1/19 Junior Seau turns 40, making the ageless wonder eight years older than offensive coordinator Josh McDaniels, five years older than fellow linebacker Tedy Bruschi and three years older than Bill Belichick's wardrobe.

Soroff On MAURA TIERNEY

ER star Maura Tierney lauds Tina Fey and recalls her Catholic school days.

BORN AND RAISED IN BOSTON, ER fave Maura Tierney is the daughter of former city councilor Joe Tierney. She grew up in Hyde Park, attended Notre Dame Academy and studied at NYU before leaving to pursue stage work. After moving to L.A., she landed a part on the hit comedy series NewsRadio. Tierney, 43, later earned an Emmy nomination for her role on ER. Her screen credits include Liar Liar with Jim Carrey, Primary Colors with John Travolta, Forces of Nature with Ben Affleck and Sandra Bullock, Semi-Pro with Will Ferrell and Woody Harrelson, and Baby Mama with Tina Fey and Amy Poehler. In 2006, she starred in the off-Broadway production of Neil LaBute's Some Girl(s). With ER wrapping, Tierney joins the cast of Denis Leary's TV show Rescue Me. She divides her time between L.A. and New York.

Jonathan Soroff: The last time we spoke was probably 3,000 interviews ago for you, around when you did Liar Liar. Do you remember what I asked you?
Maura Tierney: I do not.

Oh, good. That means I can use the same questions, and you won't know the difference.
You can try.

OK, let's start with the filming of Baby Mama. Did Amy Poehler and Tina Fey make you wet your pants?
No. [Laughs.] It's funny. On set, yes, they're funny. But a lot of times, comedians—and I've worked with a lot of big, famous ones—are very serious people in real life. They're smart. They're usually intense. So Tina Fey's a lovely person, but when she's working, she's really working. Very focused.

Is Jim Carrey funnier than those two?
They're funnier than him, if I had to rank them. They're very diligent, hardworking people. They aren't clowns.

So what's funnier to you: an anvil falling on a coyote's head or a mouse nailing a cat's tail to the floor?
Neither of those things do I find particularly funny. I don't even think I laughed at them in cartoons as a kid. I was an extremely sophisticated child. [Laughs.]

If you were a real doctor, what kind would you be?
Well, judging by the amount of money I pay my dermatologist, the most lucrative would be that. But I wouldn't want to be a doctor.

PHOTOGRAPH BY Nick Onken/Lamoine Photo Group

Could you fake it in a real ER?
No, because I'd probably start saying all the stuff we say on the show, like, "Clear! Blah blah blah!" and the real doctors would be saying, "What the hell is this person talking about?"

Ever had to do any emergency medicine in real life?
No. But someone did choke at my house one time, and I didn't respond. I had a friend there who was a real nurse, and a fake doctor—me—but it was my friend Michael who did [the Heimlich]. The person started choking on his steak, making the signal, and we were all freaked out, but Michael, who's a writer, just did the Heimlich and then finished his drink.

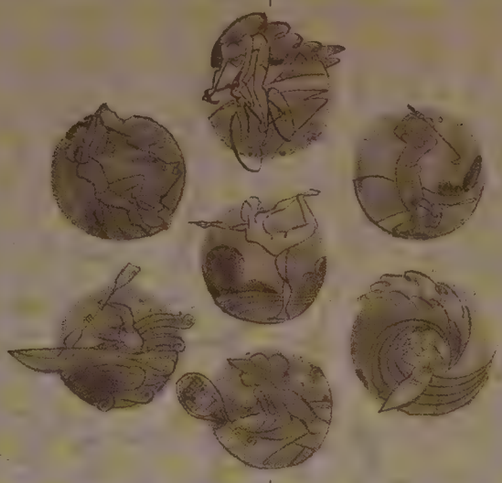
What would you do if I started making weird choking noises right now?
Oh, gosh. Hang up and [tell] my publicist, "Jonathan sounded funny. You may want to look into that."

Most bizarre or obscure medical condition you came across on ER*?*
I believe on one episode we had a bunch of children infected with monkeypox. I'm not sure if they made that up or if it's a real thing. But the hospital was put under quarantine.

Is there a person you would never work with again?
Yes. It wasn't on the show, and I can't even describe the situation, because it would be obvious. So let's leave it at that. But I will say that the older I get, the less patience I have for stuff. The point is to work and be collaborative and hopefully create something that's interesting for people to watch. Not to jerk yourself off. We're all narcissists in this business—I think actors generally are—but there's a line, y'know, where someone else's narcissism gets in the way of mine. [Laughs.] Then I refuse to work with them again.

You were nominated for, but didn't win, the Emmy. Why don't you just recite the acceptance speech you had prepared right now?
Oh, God. Y'know, I truly don't remember, because it was two months after 9/11, so none of that seemed at all important. I was more thinking about the fact that I was on a TV show about emergency medical workers, and in real life, there were all these emergency medical workers trying to save actual lives. Winning an Emmy didn't seem so important.

In high school, were you a drama queen?
No. I went to an all-girls Catholic high school. The concept of drama queen didn't even exist there.



Did the nuns beat you to within an inch of your life with a ruler?
Psychologically and emotionally, yes. I think maybe being an actor comes out of that repression.

Last time you found yourself acting in real life when you wanted the other person to think you were being sincere?
How 'bout two minutes ago?

Is Grey's Anatomy ER lite?
Never seen it. I don't watch other medical shows.

So you've never seen Scrubs*?*
I saw the musical one.

It's like ER*'s wiseass little brother. Last question: When are you going to come back to Boston and make a movie about your hometown?*
I want to direct a movie in Boston, and I have no desire to direct anything else, ever. I really don't. But if I did a movie in Boston, I'd want to be in charge of it, because they usually get it wrong. A few movies have [gotten it right], but mostly they don't. ✖✖✖

GOING COLD TOFURKY

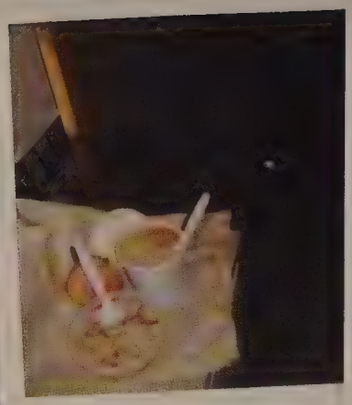
A COMMITTED CARNIVORE TURNS VEGAN

BY LINH TRAN BRINCAT

I'M THE QUEEN OF CARNIVORES. I've chowed down a porterhouse by myself and used the remains to make a mean beef stew the next day. When I was seven, I successfully convinced the lunch lady that I was allergic to salad to make more room on my plate for the mystery meat. I also hold a special place in my heart for dairy, particularly Brie and Stilton. So it was with great trepidation that I wistfully tossed my bag of stock bones from the freezer—and bid good-bye to the eggs, milk and cheese that brought me so much pleasure—to try veganism.

Like everyone else, I vaguely knew that meat, especially the red variety, can be bad for the body and the environment. But my willful ignorance allowed me to tune out the details, including research linking animal-based diets to cancer, mad-cow disease and obesity. And I definitely didn't want to hear about livestock gas, which beats out cars, buses and airplanes to account for 18 percent of all ozone-depleting emissions on the planet, according to United Nations estimates. While more of my peers opted for light salads after reading Eric Schlosser's Fast Food Nation and watching Morgan Spurlock's Super Size Me, I still clung desperately to my leg of lamb like a culinary caveman.

But as the economic bubble burst, so did my faith in rich foods. It became harder to justify cravings for foie gras, prosciutto di Parma and osso buco. Those decadent delicacies belong to a fallen era of perpetual growth, absurd housing prices and job security. What I needed was a diet based on cold, harsh reality and leaner times—and I found it going vegan.



My goals were straightforward, if a bit unrealistic: Stop eating flesh, dairy, eggs and honey for a week, then revel in a healthier, slimmer body and clean conscience. Here's what actually happened.

If consuming cute creatures means turning a blind eye to ethical and health implications, then becoming vegan involves cultivating a superhuman consciousness. For some, it's not enough to eliminate obvious animal by-products like dairy, eggs or honey. There are more sinister ingredients on labels to avoid: gelatin, made from cow and pigs' hooves and tendons; isinglass, a wine clarifier derived from fish bladders; and the ubiquitous natural flavors, a catch-all term that can disguise anything. Then there are seemingly harmless ingredients that join the no-no list because of the way they're processed, like cane sugar filtered through bone char. Considering my cold-Tofurky approach extreme enough, I didn't become a process vegan, or go guerilla-journalist–crazy and get rid of my down coat and shearling boots. As a California transplant, I might starve, but I wasn't about to freeze to death.

It was cruel enough that the start of my experiment coincided with The Improper's holiday party—held at Fleming's Prime Steakhouse & Wine Bar. That Monday lives in infamy. Still ravenous and slightly depressed from consuming only a shredded-carrot sandwich for lunch (my first vegan meal), I automatically positioned myself at the kitchen entrance, where the waitstaff carried out trays of hors d'oeuvres. I clearly hadn't ingested enough calories from my roughage hoagie for proper brain-functioning, because unthinkingly I reached for a bacon-wrapped scallop, earning stern looks from my coworkers. They might have seen a lone tear trail down my cheek. It seemed so unnatural, so counter-evolutionary to be hungry at a feast.

It was also counter-cultural for me to pass up free seafood. As Vietnamese boat people who survived a month on the open ocean, my parents drilled into me the importance of going for the most expensive items at the buffet, which meant shrimp, oysters and—holy jackpot—lobsters. What self-respecting refugee would pass that up? Or at least that's how I rationalized sneaking some beef and a lobster tail later that night. A tipsy guy snitched me out, but I buried the shame of being told, "You really don't have any self-control do you?" deep underneath a second helping of roast beef.

My first day on the diet was already a disaster. I was neglecting the advice of The Complete Idiot's Guide to Vegan Living and Evelyn Kimber, president of the Boston Vegetarian Society, by not eliminating foods gradually. And I was paying the price of going to a steakhouse, hovering around the raw bar and ogling the carving station. Thankfully, vegans were also a forgiving people. The Complete Idiot's Guide provided me with hope: "Approach it one item and one meal at a time. Don't beat yourself up if you stumble and give into a craving for a cheeseburger or pizza at first."

Save for that night, the most vulnerable vegan moments occurred in the uncaffeinated morning hours. One day, I was so absorbed in congratulating myself for ordering a vegan bagel, that when the barista asked if I wanted milk or cream in my coffee, I instinctively said, "Milk," not realizing my mistake until I had chugged enough to sufficiently awaken from my sleepy stupor.

I failed, I learned, when I didn't divorce myself from my previous meat-think, when I wasn't vigilant about controlling my environment and ingredients. So I set about appreciating the thousand faces of soy.

Soy in vegan cuisine is like rice in Chinese cooking or pasta in Italian. From those raw edamame beans in Japanese restaurants come a diversity of foodstuffs: tofu, tempeh, TVP (textured vegetable protein, mock ground beef) and seitan (pronounced "Say-tan" not "Satan"; the fake chicken, seafood and beef at veggie restaurants). Instead of milk, yogurt, cheese and ice cream, vegans opt for their soy counterparts, which can be found in most Boston supermarkets.

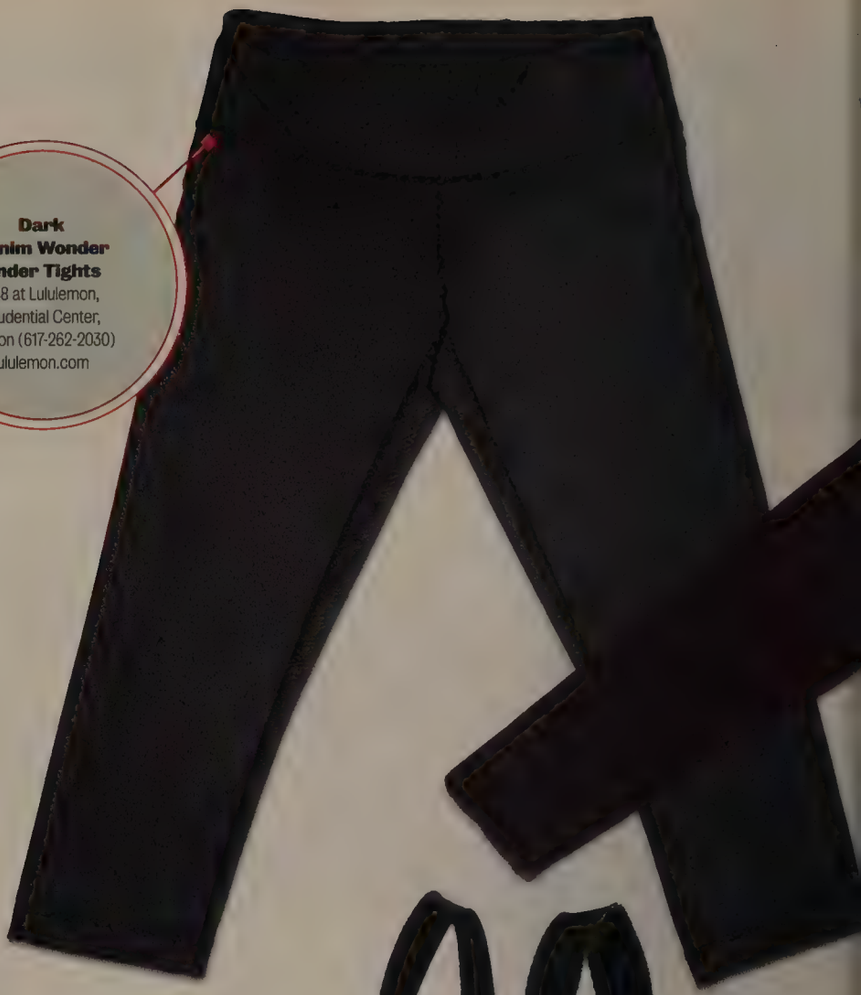
Although convenient and readily available, those substitutes, I discovered, rarely taste like the real thing. The first time I had a spiced soy sausage, I nuked it like a hot dog. Immediately the odor smoked my colleagues out from their offices. "Did you microwave cat food?" one person asked as she held her arm over her face. I had to admit the smell was reminiscent of Fancy Feast, with a whiff of burnt hair. Undeterred, I threw the sausage inside a hummus-slathered pita and took a bite. Yes, it was exactly what I imagined cat food would taste like.

My best meals were at restaurants that actually knew what they were doing. I lived off of the tomato-and-orzo soup at Mike & Patty's, a take-out counter in Bay Village. I gleefully pored over the menu at vegan-mecca Grasshopper in Allston, knowing that I could look forward to a doggie bag of stir-fry, not a kitty-in-a-blanket lunch the next day. And I appreciatively savored the vegan tasting-menu at UpStairs on the Square in Cambridge—one of the most delicious meals I've had in Boston, meatless or not. Complex, concentrated sauces complemented, instead of masked, the seasonal vegetables in dishes, like pot au feu, I had thought were the special domain of meat.

Inspired, I successfully cooked a porcini-and-portobello risotto on my last evening of veganhood. I had only made it a few times before as a side, something to serve with the requisite rotating roast, and it always came out either under- or overdone. That night my pot of arborio rice had my full attention, and I stirred the heck out of it, releasing the grains' starch to compensate for the lack of cream and butter. It was the end-all, be-all of my dinner; it had to be good.

As annoying as it was to be alert and attentive to my everyday consumption, my experiment was a useful lesson in not taking things for granted. I wish I could say I lost weight or felt healthier at the end of the week, but all the roughage had such a bloating effect, my jeans felt even tighter than before. The worst part was the touch-and-go times when I made sure not to stray too far from the bathroom.

I also wish I could say I liked eating hummus, soy and mock meat so much that I continued my experiment past its scheduled conclusion. In reality, I counted down the days by making reservations at Smith & Wollensky and distracted myself from my seriously horrifying gastro-intestinal problems by researching cuts of beef online. My return from the leafy side was a scene out of Caligula crossed with Godzilla. I gorged on a double-bacon, egg sandwich at lunch, nearly weeping when I tasted the pork. And I returned to my childhood roots at dinner, refusing to order a salad to make more room for the NY strip and prime rib I ably devoured. But so ridiculously decadent was that meal, I ended up eating vegan the next day to detox.



Since then, I've made more vegan meals, realizing dinner doesn't have to be synonymous with meat. I've learned to be more conscious of the choices I make when eating and cooking, questioning whether butter is necessary for a recipe when olive oil would do. I even dragged myself to Dudley Square to take a vegan cooking class with Didi Emmons, vegetarian cookbook author and former owner of Veggie Planet in Harvard Square. It was a rough start, but tofu has won me over—preferably topped with ground pork. ×××

Hot Damn

Into Paradise

Venerable baseball guru Peter Gammons gives you so much. All he asks in return is that you watch him play some Chuck Berry covers. On Jan. 10, after a sports roundtable at Fenway, Gammons joins Red Sox GM Theo Epstein and other special guests onstage at the Paradise Rock Club for the Hot Stove Cool Music concert. The old man has some serious chops, having spent his college years in a band called the Fabulous Penetrations. (Yeah, picture that the next time you watch SportsCenter.) Proceeds benefit the Foundation to Be Named Later. The Improper is also a sponsor. Nick Altschuller

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

Australia ★ ½ Less of an assault than his headache-inducing Moulin Rouge, director Baz Luhrmann's latest postmodern pastiche attempts to revive the sprawling, Technicolor travelogues of the early CinemaScope era. Nicole Kidman stars as an uppity Englishwoman who finds her fortune as an unlikely cattle baron in the rugged outback, thanks to Hugh Jackman's self-consciously macho, anachronistically progressive cowboy. Like most Luhrmann films, Australia is an index of iconic shots and sequences from other, better movies. There's something almost charming about the deliberately dated soundstage shooting and retro special effects, but the filmmaker's adoration of MGM artifice doesn't blend with a subplot concerning his homeland's attempted genocide of the Aborigines. It also feels like the longest movie ever made, with major characters fed to crocodiles during expository montages so that the story can keep rebooting every time you think they'll all live happily ever after. Crikey. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Changeling ★★ Clint Eastwood's latest directorial effort is a nasty little number. It's grueling and unpleasant in the manner of all late-period Eastwood, but it's missing the crucial moral uncertainty that marks his masterpieces. Angelina Jolie stars in this true story of a flapper-era single mom whose son is kidnapped and murdered. Five months later, the famously corrupt LAPD returns a boy who bears a slight resemblance, then banishes her to a mental hospital when she dares declare that this shorter little weirdo isn't actually her child. The outrageous injustice of it all doesn't escape Eastwood for a second. He's righteously angry, shooting Jolie in angelic silent-movie tableaux and casting the L.A. cops as sniveling, wormy toads. Jeffrey Donovan, the cut-rate Guy Pearce look-alike playing Jolie's grand inquisitor, lacks only a mustache to twirl. Every slightly interesting angle in this perplexing, James Ellroy–friendly tale of police corruption has been flattened out and oversimplified to the point of preposterousness. (At Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

A Christmas Tale ★★★★ Writer/director Arnaud Desplechin's dizzying take on the tired yuletide saga about a dysfunctional family is so joyously overstuffed, watching it is like speed-reading a massive Russian novel. Catherine Deneuve stars as the aloof, ailing matriarch of this screwed-up clan. She needs a bone marrow transplant, but which of her damaged, embittered offspring will provide a genetic match? With energy and good humor, Desplechin heroically pursues her family's secrets, grudges and hidden resentments. No scene plays out predictably, as the revelations and recriminations ricochet off one another to a jaunty soundtrack. In its own peculiar fashion, this twisted tale proves strangely inspiring, as it dodges pat resolutions with a rueful smile. (At Kendall Square.)

The Curious Case of Benjamin Button ★★ David Fincher, the gifted and sardonic director of Fight Club and Zodiac, goes Forrest Gump in this shockingly syrupy take on an old F. Scott Fitzgerald short story. Borrowing the premise and little else from the original work, Button stars Brad Pitt as a quizzical fellow born as a elderly man who ages backwards as the film grinds on. And on. Some gorgeous, state-of-the-art digital effects have been invented to place Pitt's face on all sorts of incongruous bodies, but besides existing as a technical marvel, there's little point to the proceedings. Screenwriter Eric Roth seems to have recycled his Forrest Gump script, changing a few names but keeping the central notion of a bumpkin in a doomed romance naively wandering through blunt historical signposts with a surfeit of cornpone aphorisms. There's no actual conflict as we wait for Pitt to grow young and die, just a lot of pretty pictures, plus the visceral nagging disappointment that a talent as subversive as Fincher's stooped to helming shiny Hollywood sap. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Defiance ★★ Director Edward Zwick, perpetrator of such prestigious snores as Blood Diamond and The Last Samurai, has an uncanny knack for sucking all the excitement out of fascinating real-life stories. Zwick strikes again with Defiance, a stodgy, lugubrious account of the Bielski brothers, who escaped from the Nazi occupation into the Belarusian forest, where they built a makeshift village, teamed up with Russian resistance fighters and protected hundreds from the Holocaust. Daniel Craig stars as Tuvia, who humorlessly assumes command of the refugee camp after his reckless brother Zus (Liev Schreiber) heads out to fight with the Russians. Billy Elliot's Jamie Bell plays another sibling, and there's even an ill-conceived

GRAN FINALE

Eastwood returns to classic form.

Gran Torino
★★★½
Starring Clint Eastwood, Bee Vang, Ahney Her, Christopher Carley and John Carroll Lynch. Written by Nick Schenk. Directed by Eastwood. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

Anthony Michael Rivetti

WAY BACK IN THE 1980s, long before Unforgiven prompted a critical reevaluation and instant status upgrade for American film's honored elder statesman, Clint Eastwood was a marginal figure in Hollywood, working outside the studio system, knocking out cheap, dirty crowd-pleasers. Much to the consternation of the intelligentsia, larks like The Dead Pool or Heartbreak Ridge made millions. The slapdash production values, amateur-hour supporting casts and air of lowbrow humor often blinded folks to the fact that these movies were a bit more thoughtful than expected, particularly in the way Eastwood love story tossed in for good measure. In typical Zwick fashion, the over-scaled, curiously bloodless action sequences lack any sense of urgency, and the details of a compelling tale are smothered in Hollywood cheese. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Doubt ★★★ Sometimes subtlety is overrated. Just ask Meryl Streep, who smacks her lips and carves ham as the ferocious Sister Aloysius in John Patrick Shanley's big-screen adaptation of his Pulitzer Prize–winning play. In a Bronx Catholic School circa 1964, Streep's nasty, uptight nun stares daggers at Philip Seymour Hoffman's progressive, freewheeling Father Flynn. But when Flynn's potentially inappropriate relationship with the school's first black student is called into question, we're in for some grand Inside the Actor's Studio explosions. Shanley's meaty moral questionnaire explores the gulf between tradition and modernity in the heightened form of a parable, with Amy Adams' meek Sister James torn between our protagonists. Shanley hasn't directed since 1990's tragically underrated Joe Versus the Volcano, and while his visuals are fairly perfunctory, he's at least wise enough to embrace his own material's inherent staginess, highlighting the broad theatricality of these performances. You'll never forget you're watching a filmed play, but with a cast like this, who can complain? (Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Four Christmases ★★ Vince Vaughn makes a magnificent thin-skinned jerk, rolling his eyes and nattering over some perceived slight. The only catch is that he's no good at sincerity, which is a big problem now that he's starring in his second sappy holiday flick in as many years. (The less said about Fred Claus, the better.) Four Christmases stars Vaughn and Reese Witherspoon as callow yuppies attempting to avoid an uncomfortable quartet of family dinners. These are two selfish, uncaring people, but the movie lacks the nerve to follow through on their monstrousness, instead pleading for our sympathy and presenting their families as cartoonish, bullying grotesques. There's one nicely played sequence involving Sissy Spacek as Vaughn's horny, hippie mom and a game of Taboo, but the rest of these meals are sub-Fockers slapstick. Director Seth Gordon helmed last year's phenomenal documentary The King of Kong, but his feature debut fails to sustain a consistent tone. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Frost/Nixon ★★ ½ In refashioning Peter Morgan's smash 2006 play for the big screen, director Ron Howard made a wise move casting original stars Michael Sheen and Frank Langella. This picture has a ton of problems, but at the very least, Sheen's sly performance as seemingly callow chat-show host David Frost and Langella's towering Tricky Dick have been preserved on film for posterity. Morgan's play positioned Frost's 1977 televised interviews with Nixon as a David and Goliath battle, a belated national catharsis in which the wily interrogator tripped the disgraced former president into something close to a mea culpa. Where Howard errs is exactly where this terminally dull filmmaker always errs: He treats his audience like imbeciles. We've got all the makings of a brilliant psychodrama playing out in the loaded glares and strategic statements of Sheen and Langella, yet Howard constantly cuts away to a fake documentary format with a peanut gallery of bit players staring straight into the lens and helpfully explaining everything we've just seen. Thanks, Opie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.) manipulated and questioned his own mythic persona.

After his recent, punishing run of downbeat dramas, he must have been in a nostalgic mood. (Or maybe he sat through Changeling and decided enough of this Oscar crap already.) Whatever the case, Gran Torino finds Eastwood pulling double duty behind and in front of the camera, sputtering, spitting and cussing his way through his most baroquely gravel-voiced performance since Heartbreak Ridge. From the opening moments, when he disapprovingly notices his granddaughter's navel piercing and actually growls into the camera, it's plainly obvious that Torino isn't trying to be one of the director's austere chamber pieces.

Eastwood plays Walt Kowalski, a grizzled Korean War vet who, after the death of his wife, whiles away the days sitting on his front porch, guzzling cans of Pabst Blue Ribbon, chain-smoking and offering salty observations on the decline of his white-flight Detroit neighborhood. Barking dated slurs for every minority in his sight, he's like Dirty Harry in the sunset years. Walt has little affection for his fat, greedy sons, and don't get him started on those lazy grandkids. He just polishes his mint-condition 1972 Gran Torino, the gleaming Michigan muscle car serving as an unsubtle emblem for the vanished America of better days.

> It's entertaining throughout, playing like catnip to longtime Eastwood fans.

A variety of contrivances find Walt begrudgingly befriending a family of Hmong immigrants next door. Young Thao (Bee Vang) is an awkward, bookish kid and thus prime recruiting material for the local gangs. When these thugs make the mistake of scuffling on Walt's pristine front yard, they end up kicking over the wrong geezer's garden gnome.

There are few sights in recent film more amusing than that of the 78-year-old Eastwood staring down a crew of teenage gangbangers, brandishing an M1 rifle and snarling: "Get off my lawn."

Nick Schenk's screenplay is hardly sophisticated stuff, but it's nonetheless a pleasure to watch the crotchety old bigot warm to his neighbors. Walt takes Thao under his wing and attempts to teach the kid the value of hard work and how to talk like a man, or at the very least, how to "stop acting like such a goddamned pussy all the time." In the process, the old dog learns a few new tricks, eventually coming to the conclusion that he's got more in common with the foreigners than his family.

In the manner of Eastwood's '80s efforts, Gran Torino looks like it was shot over the course of a long weekend and cost about 15 bucks. Clumsy and crude, the entire film is pitched at the same hyperbolic level as Eastwood's oversized performance. And yet it's entertaining throughout, playing like catnip to longtime fans. There's a valedictory air to his acting, studded as it is with explicit references to Harry Callahan, Gunny Highway and Josey Wales. Walt's even got an adversarial relationship with a young Catholic priest, played quite badly by Christopher Carley, that feels like the cartoon version of Million Dollar Baby.

But what's most interesting is that, despite the broad comedic tone and a couple of badass showdown sequences worthy of a Dirty Harry sequel, Gran Torino is suffused with Eastwood's career-spanning notion that most problems can't be solved by an angry white guy with a gun. (In fact, usually he just makes them worse.) As the movie meanders towards its melodramatic conclusion, Walt realizes that he's grown obsolete, a companion piece to that old car in the driveway.

If, as rumored, this is truly Eastwood's final performance, it's a fitting send-off to a screen legend. ✖✖✖

Milk ★★★ ½ Playing the title role in Gus Van Sant's rousing, surprisingly accessible biography of slain civil-rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years: He smiles. Oscar-season biopics often feel like homework, but Van Sant charts Milk's rise to prominence as the first openly gay man elected to public office as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead, who clearly hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High. Eight years ago, this gifted director turned his back on Hollywood, devoting himself to abstract, lyrical films like Gerry, Last Days, and his recent Paranoid Park. In such difficult company, Milk feels startlingly conventional. It's crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining, yet crafted with savvy visual intelligence by Van Sant and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides. Like the inclusive American ideals Milk so boisterously advocated, the movie is open to everybody. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Quantum of Solace ★★★ If you look at Casino Royale as the James Bond franchise's Batman Begins, this nasty piece of business counts as the series' The Dark Knight, as it sends a dour and vengeful 007 into a chaotic world gone wrong. Daniel Craig once again compellingly plays the legendary secret agent as a perpetual motion machine, brusque and cruel in the manner of Ian Fleming's original novels. The film takes a while to get rolling, as it's front-loaded with too many inconsequential chase sequences that are often poorly staged by director Marc Forster. But Quantum improves considerably once folks are allowed to settle down and start speaking to one another. Paul Haggis' screenplay snarkily reconfigures the past movies' shadowy cabal Spectre as a new millennium group of cutthroat capitalists bleeding the world's natural resources dry. It's lean and mean to a fault; a bit more breathing room for the supporting cast might have helped matters. Still, the sheer viciousness of the film and bleakness of its worldview are bracing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (At Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs)

Seven Pounds ★ ½ Containing roughly 20 minutes of story stretched out to a full two hours, this exceedingly poor film directed by Gabriele Muccino is nothing but smoke and mirrors. Seven Pounds plays out like an exercise in needless viewer annoyance. Will Smith stars as Ben Thomas, maybe. He might be an IRS agent traveling around the country auditing people who just so happen to be suffering from terminal illnesses. But then again, he might not. There's also much ado about a poisonous jellyfish. Good manners and common decency prohibit me from exposing the character's ultimate purpose, but I can say that it's so insanely, egregiously stupid that when I've tried to spoil the ending for friends, most of them refuse to believe me. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in suburbs.)

Synecdoche, New York ★★ In his startlingly original screenplays for Being John Malkovich, Adaptation and Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, Charlie Kaufman merged depressive angst with absurdist whimsy to create his own genre: heartsick slapstick. His directorial debut, a grammar-nerd goof on my mom's hometown of Schenectady, is similarly ambitious but lacks any levity or momentum. The film is obsessed with the ways art cannibalizes life, the deterioration of the human body and finally the grim inevitability of death. Philip Seymour Hoffman stars as a sickly theater director attempting to make sense of his life by staging it as an ever-evolving theater experience, until he becomes so consumed with recasting and rewriting that he loses all trace of himself. It's a nifty metaphor, one perhaps more suited for a novel, but as a feature, Synecdoche is an unbearable grind that's relentlessly one-note, dingy and oppressive as you wait for everybody to die of old age. The movie is thrilling to discuss afterward, but torture to actually sit through. (At Kendall Square.)

Twilight ★ Stephenie Meyer's tween novels reach their insidious cinematic potential in the hands of Catherine Hardwicke, who trivialized adolescent drug use with her insipid Thirteen before shrinking the Virgin Mary's life story into a Dude, Where's My Manger epic in her justly forgotten Nativity Story. Twilight teaches young girls that a hunky, handsome vampire (Robert Pattinson) will always love you for your clumsy, banal self, no matter how dull you are. The film is a deeply unsettling glimpse into modern American psychosis, equating desire with death and boasting enlightened concepts like, "We can't go all the way, because then you'll turn into a monster." So amateurishly assembled that the villains don't even arrive until the 90-minute mark, this is Hardwicke's most incompetent movie yet, about as lame as you'd expect from a 53-year-old lady lecturing "these kids, today." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Karen Ballard

Depth Defying

Bond's Bore Jamie Bell and Daniel Craig star as siblings in director Edward Zwick's less-than-thrilling Defiance.

Valkyrie ★★ ½ Tom Cruise is more famous these days for bizarre behavior than blockbusters, so in desperate need of career rehab, he tries to kill Hitler. Cruise stars as Colonel Claus von Stauffenberg, a Nazi with a conscience, whose suitcase bombing nearly took out der Führer in WWII's waning days. It's a handsomely mounted production directed with brisk efficiency by Bryan Singer, and as a pal surmised, "It will probably be wicked suspenseful for anybody who didn't pay attention in history class." Short on characterization and long on Hitchockian set pieces, Valkyrie is leaner than your typical WWII drama. Normally this might be a refreshing change of pace, but absent a compelling point of view, the movie is too focused on the nuts and bolts of an assassination attempt that we already know was a failure. It's hard to get yourself invested. Cruise remains tediously noble, and despite the period trappings, it's not really so different from one of his Mission: Impossible movies. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

W. ★★★ Hardly the comic hit-piece Dems were hoping for, Oliver Stone's curiously compassionate take on Bush turns out to be one of the legendary muckraker's most restrained pictures. Hewing largely to the historical record, Stanley

Weiser's succinct screenplay runs on double tracks, alternating snatches of Dubya's wasted youth and born-again reformation with scenes from our long walk to war in Iraq. In the title role, Josh Brolin exhibits an uncanny mastery of the sputtering grammatical train wrecks and apish arm gestures that have made their mark these past eight years. It's bizarrely entertaining to watch Stone's blunt force dramatizations of those sinister cabinet meetings, with special scorn heaped on Toby Jones' Karl Rove and Richard Dreyfuss' subtly menacing Dick Cheney. As in his audacious 1995 biopic, Nixon, Stone can't help but muster sympathy for the devil. W. is the tragedy of a deeply shallow, arrogant man, who works out his daddy issues on an international stage. (In the suburbs.)

The Wrestler ★★★★ The movie is shrewd enough to use Mickey Rourke's decimated visage to its advantage. Hell, it's practically a monument to his personal ruin. Rourke's washed-up wrestler, Randy "The Ram," is a teetering wreck who doesn't stand a chance of recapturing his former glory, and every close-up hammers that point home. Faced with a health crisis, he makes a few efforts. He reaches out to a sympathetic stripper (well played by Marisa Tomei) who similarly finds herself growing too old for her profession. He briefly attempts to reconnect with his estranged daughter (Evan Rachel Wood), but all the damage he inflicted in the past can't be easily undone. The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions, it simply asks that we spend a little time with these people and live inside their world for a spell. Here, at last, is a true sequel to the original Rocky, full of quiet desperation, squalid backdrops and earthy humor. (At Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Zack and Miri Make a Porno ★★★ Kevin Smith's first decent film in a decade conspicuously borrows current comedy hero Judd Apatow's stock company of actors. This makes a strange sort of sense, as the man-children and scatological sweetness of Apatow's The 40-Year-Old Virgin and Superbad owe enormous debts to Smith's do-it-yourself debut, Clerks. It's also just refreshing to see trained professionals handle Smith's unwieldy, overwritten dialogue as opposed to his high-school buddies or Ben Affleck. The hilarious Seth Rogen and a luminous Elizabeth Banks star as broke best friends attempting to make a stag movie for quick cash and discovering unexpected feelings once it comes time to perform. Sunny and optimistic even when wallowing in potty-mouthed filth (real-life porn stars Traci Lords and Katie Morgan play pivotal roles), the film is an unexpectedly heartfelt salute to the creative process. Zack and Miri fosters fond feelings for this makeshift family of slackers, who grow and prosper by focusing their energy into a productive endeavor, even if it's one that involves anal sex. (In the suburbs.)

The Rosebuds

RALEIGH CAN'T COMPETE with Brooklyn or even smaller urban centers like Boston or Seattle when it comes to indie-rock. But bands like the Rosebuds and Annuals are putting the capital of North Carolina on the map—like Ben Folds Five and Superchunk once did for nearby Chapel Hill.

"Sometimes I romanticize it; I love to think of it as this bohemian dream-come-true in North Carolina," says singer Kelly Crisp, who fronts the Rosebuds with her husband, Ivan Howard. "We have this group of people who we love as people to hang out with all the time, and have late nights making crazy music together with four-track tapes that nobody will ever hear. Then sometimes, stuff works out."

Not only has it worked out for the Rosebuds over four well-received albums, but recent alum Justin Vernon went off and made his own acclaimed disc under the moniker Bon Iver.

Crisp and Annuals singer/songwriter Adam Baker both cite a current groundswell of great Raleigh bands. "I'm really proud of our scene," Baker says, "and if we helped at all to bring some focus to the area, I'm really proud of that."

His sextet even benefits from major-label distribution, a rarity in today's music industry for a grassroots group, especially one as ambitious in scope as Annuals, which play the Paradise Lounge Jan. 27.

Their second CD, Such Fun, conjures an eclectic mash of keyboard and string orchestration, shifting guitar, tribal drums and alt-country touches. From delicate piano threads to the African-pop feel of "Hardwood Floor," the CD slips all over the place, connected by sharply honed melodies that bring uplift to tunes about loss and loneliness.

"I like genre-jumping, and tying it together is definitely the hard part," says Baker, who counts Johnny Cash, the Beach Boys, Paul Simon and Björk among his main influences. "But I see a song less as a dilemma and just fun. It's kind of like a puzzle. When it fits together just right and it gives you goose bumps, that's when you know a song is good."

He also gives himself the time to find those goose bumps. "I'll obsess over a song for a week, then leave and come back to it," Baker says of his computer remixing in the band's home studio, a trial-and-error habit that he says can drive coproducers crazy. "They don't understand why I'm doing it, like I should know exactly what I'm doing when I go in [to the studio]. It makes people nervous that I don't.

"Most times, [a song] slowly transforms into a completely different song," says Baker, crediting his fellow Annuals for the multi-instrumental flexibility needed to rearrange songs for the stage as well. "I love making a mistake and coming across an even better way to play certain parts."

Annuals

"If we helped at all to bring some focus to the area, I'm really proud of that."

The Rosebuds, in turn, credit happenstance for their own creation. Crisp was doing some stage acting and Howard was in another band when he got the call for a last-minute gig. "He said, 'My band can't do it, but my new band can do it.' And he hung up and looked at me and said, 'We're in a band and we have a show tonight,'" Crisp says. "We put together five songs and went down to the club with a drum machine."

They were invited back and built a following. "We used to have a real performance-art thing going back then," adds Crisp, whose band plays the Middle East Downstairs on Jan. 17. "We'd take our living room down to the club, set it up and play in that." And when they replaced the drum machine with a human timekeeper, she jokes, "We started looking like a rock band, and everything got un-cool about us!"

Seven years later, guitarist Howard and keyboardist Crisp have established their own cool groove, gliding atop a moody pulse that nods to their common love for the Cure. The Rosebuds' latest album, Life Like, pulls back from the synth-pop of 2007's Night of the Furies for a more relaxed set of pop that draws power from the duo's traded vocals: his low-toned croon balanced by her angelic nonchalance.

In turn, Life Like tempers Night of the Furies' political edge. "All the songs we wrote seemed very natural to talk about in conversation," Crisp says. "It was real simple."

One song, "Nice Fox," refers to a fox that lived in the woods on the couple's property. "We found it dead, and we buried him," she says. "We were so sad, because we were real proud that we had a fox. So we made a little wooden cross that we put on his grave and it said, 'Nice Fox.'"

Part of the disc came from a three-year-old session with Vernon, who joined the Rosebuds for a 2007 tour after he made For Emma, Forever Ago in a Wisconsin cabin. When he brought that demo back to Raleigh, Crisp encouraged him to release it as Bon Iver, a bastardized French phrase for "good winter" that he had used to sign a letter to her.

Now he's touring with the Rosebuds' drummer, and they're headed out with the bassist from Vernon's onetime outfit Megafaun. "What's the word for that, nepotism?" says Crisp, referring to her region's insulated music community in general. "We've got our hands in each other's projects." ✖✖✖

Lust for Life

Rave On Although inspired by old-school legends like Buddy Holly, the Raveonettes are unapologetic about tackling the pitfalls of modern love. In their latest album, Lust Lust Lust, singer/songwriter Sune Rose Wagner and his stylish, platinum-blonde bandmate, Sharin Foo, explore desire, addiction and infidelity, wrapping Wagner's dark lyrics in the group's signature melodies, distorted electric guitars and whispered harmonies. HOW MANY SHELLS CAN A TOP CHEF SHUCK?

Mmm, Mmm, Good...

Creamy butternut squash soup with parmesan. Hazelnut onion brioche served with a 2006 Meursault. Pan-fried hake with celeriac, pomegranate and parsley, accompanied by a 2007 Sancerre. Tenderloin with chanterelles and Jerusalem artichoke mousse, washed down with a 2005 Bordeaux. And then came dessert.

The Grow Clinic at the Boston Medical Center certainly lived up to its name (my waistline grew by at least two inches) at its 15th annual Food for Thought Dinner, held at the Mandarin Oriental.

The clinic, which battles malnourishment through a food pantry, nutritional counseling and other innovative programs, attracted the support of such high-profile do-gooders as Steve and Joan Belkin and their raven-haired daughter, Amy, concessions gazillionaire Joe O'Donnell, twin investment whizzes Wes and Paul Karger, construction mogul John Fish, banking behemoth John Hammill, real estate tycoon Mark Andrus, the statuesque Olga Rogal and her other half, Andrew, the ever-affable Bob "Mr. Dunkin' Donuts" Rosenberg and the ethereal Mary Wolfson, the ubiquitous and über-philanthropic Cutlers, Seeligs, Goldfarbs and Goldbergs, and just about everyone else with juice in this town.

Sotto voce, one guest said of a man to whom he'd just been introduced, "Are you kidding me? That sounds like a clown's name," to which his friend responded, "Well, he is a clown. He's in finance."

However, the evening's most arresting comment came from the guy who proudly announced, apropos of absolutely nothing, "I was pulled over last week with three strippers from Centerfolds."

The scary part is that we believed him.

Contest of the Month...

One of the swankiest holiday shindigs in town is hosted by the Ritz-Carlton, which transformed its ballroom into a Christmas-y disco featuring music by superstar DJ Deja, a full raw bar and other delicacies, free-flowing top-shelf booze, staggering flower arrangements, and a guest list that included such pre- and post-facelift socialites as shrinking violet Marilyn Riseman, brunette stunner Dr. Deanna Lites, Arctic blonde art dealer Anja Kola and one woman who said, "You can't swear at the Ritz," to which her friend immediately replied, "Horseshit. You just have to do it softly and with an accent."

Mario Russo and Meg Gordon at ICA 360

Maggie Gold-Seelig and Manuel Jr. Santaren at the Food for Thought Dinner at the Mandarin Oriental

DJ Deja at the Ritz-Carlton

Chris Benz at ICA 360

Ashley Olsen at ICA 360

The reader who guesses the number of oysters Ritz-Carlton chef Irving Concepcion shucked (by his own estimate) at the event's raw bar will receive lunch for two at the hotel. Like The Price Is Right, the prize goes to the person who is closest without going over. As for Irving, he'll be receiving an Improper Bostonian T-shirt, along with an invitation to come to the beach (as long as he brings his shucking knife) next summer.

Full House...

Most second anniversaries don't include hordes of socialites and fashion designers boozing and schmoozing under a giant disco ball with an acoustic guitar duo in the corner and a brief-but-shining appearance by a child-star-turned-tabloid fixture. Then again, the Institute of Contemporary Art is anything but conventional.

ICA 360, the museum's party to celebrate the second anniversary of its landmark waterfront building, presented the latest in fashion by the hottest American designers, including Proenza Schouler, Zac Posen, Tuleh, Derek Lam and Chris Benz, who is now officially my favorite fashion whiz because we had a martini together. (Does that make me superficial or just vapid?)

Pretty much everyone who's anyone was there, from cochairs Meg Gordon and Mario Russo, to fashion plates like Nancy Adams, Sukey Bigham, Patty Ribacoff, and sisters Jennifer Epstein and Audrey Reny, to artists and dealers like painter/sculptor Tristan Govignon and the entire Rotenberg clan, as well as Boston's hottest new import, Adriana Sassoon (the Brazilian former model married to hair-care mogul Elan). Given how long she stayed (approximately five minutes) and her elfin stature, it was easy to miss special guest Ashley Olsen (sans Mary-Kate), but she did inspire the following exchange, overheard by the bar:

"She has a book out, you know. It's called Influence."

"Shouldn't that be Under the....?" ✖✖✖ Casting Call

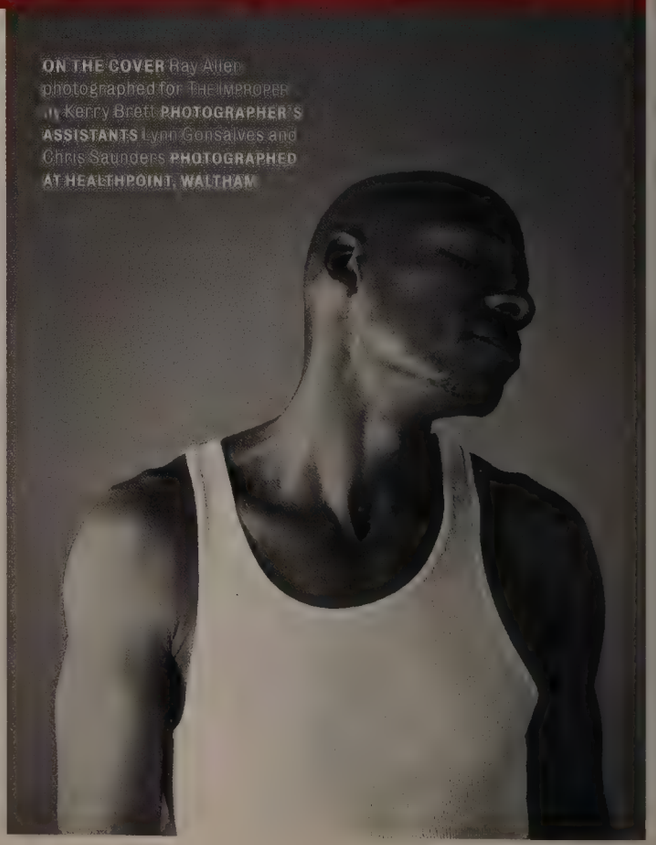
My family likes to play a game where we cast the movie of our lives. My sister scores with Natalie Portman as her alter ego, while my husband is just as lucky with George Clooney. My mom used to be Meg Ryan (before the scary Botox) and then Diane Keaton (before the scary hoop skirts). My dad has accepted his fate as Steve Martin.

In a similar spirit, we offer you 10 big-time Bostonians and the film roles they call to mind. The exercise says more about the newsmakers, including Theo Epstein, Larry Summers and Tom Perrotta, than it does about Hollywood. It's a fun reminder that this town has some seriously colorful characters. Since it's our man issue, the picks are decidedly XY.



Who'd play Ray Allen is another question. Perhaps Usher, a comparison Rich Levine draws in his feature on the Celtics star. The two share a definite smoothness. Allen is all about humility, though, with no need for flash. Off the court, he's focused on raising awareness for juvenile diabetes, which affects his son.

I have a little man of my own on the way and will take off soon for maternity leave. I wonder if he knows his mom supposedly should be portrayed by Reese Witherspoon? (A mixed result when you consider Election and Legally Blonde.) I can't wait to see what his personality is like. Andrew Rimas, another great guy, will fill this space during my absence.

WOOD FOR THOUGHT

POETS, IN THE popular mind, are either mopey teens in love with their own preciousness, or rappers. They're not supposed to be sawdusted workmen who own their own bevels. But then, the Carpenter Poets are an oddity.

"It's not an academic thing," says Joe Bergin, 57, one of the founding members of the poetry club. "It springs from your daily flavors and thoughts. It's a folk art." For the past 10 years, the Carpenter Poets have convened at the James's Gate pub in Jamaica Plain to discuss their compositions about topics like lumber. "Wood and the forest is a common theme," says Bergin, a professional carpenter by day. "So is danger of injury."

Last autumn, the Carpenter Poets published their first collection, titled Break Time. "It sells briskly at the lumberyard," says Bergin, whose own models include Robert Frost and Robert Bly. "As carpenters, we try to piece things together lyrically. We put some artistic flair into our craft, and it's the same with words." Over the years, the response to those words has been — positive that Bergin was inspired to canvas for the creation of a city poet laureate post — an appointment filled this month by former Emerson College professor Sam Cornish.

"We need someone to express the deep feelings of the citizens when the time calls for it," Bergin says. "And someone had the idea of having a Red Sox poetry contest. Now that would bring people together!" ANDREW RIMAS

Drink of the Moment

Fire Water

The Scoville scale measures the piquancy of peppers. The jalapeño, which many people push to the edge of salads or leave discarded in pizza boxes, rates around 5,000 Scovilles. The scotch bonnet measures around 250,000, or 50 times higher. To put that in disturbing perspective, consider a hot day 85 degrees. Fifty times that is 4,250 degrees, or warm enough to melt your tongue out of your mouth and then reduce your skeleton to ash.

"A lot of times people order it, and we're like, 'This is really, really hot,'" bartender Brian Kuhlen says of East Coast Grill's Martini From Hell ($7.50). "We give them a taste, and they're like, 'Alright,' and sometimes they order it."

The martini uses vodka infused with West African fatali scotch bonnets, one of the abusive older brothers in the habañero family. Cutting the peppers requires gloves. Mixing the cocktail requires separate equipment. "We use special shakers, because unless you run it through the dishwasher, you're not getting the taste out," explains bartender Jim Walsh, after pouring a glass and grabbing a giant wedge of cornbread. "I'll get you some milk."

The drink looks jagged and ready to cut. But while it's hot, it's not unbearable. It really only burns when you exhale. The spice does get stronger as you go, which is both exciting and disheartening. "Ninety percent of what we do is an ode to the ethnicities that use that stuff in their cooking," Kuhlen says. "Ten percent is just to mess with you." NICK ALTSCHULLER

Good Eats

What a Sport

It wasn't just the Beacon Hill yuppies who flung their forks in exasperation when Barbara Lynch retired her cafe menu from the front room at No. 9 Park. Sophisticated carb-addicts across town wondered if they'd ever slurp another bowlful of her hand-cut tagliatelle. We'd like to officially put an end to the panic and redirect noodle-craving customers to Sportello, her upmarket Italian diner in the Fort Point area. There, Lynch not only resurrects her velvety Bolognese sauce, but punches up the dish with a gutsier combination of spaghetti-like bigoli strands punctuated with briny littleneck clams, creamy sea urchin and flecks of salty blue-fin tuna bottarga. ELIZABETH BOMZE

ASK THE EXPERT

Q: WHAT MAKES SOME FACES MORE ATTRACTIVE THAN OTHERS?

KEN NAKAYAMA PROFESSOR OF PSYCHOLOGY AT HARVARD UNIVERSITY

Aside from some obvious things that prevent a face from being beautiful (bad skin, strong asymmetries, deviations from typicality), current research on facial attractiveness shows that one of the most important characteristics for the female face is that it appears feminine. Some of these aspects are emphasized in makeup, raising and thinning the eyebrows, increasing the contrast of the mouth and eyes (using lipstick and eyeshadow). Curiously, the converse is not the case for male faces. Although there is good agreement as to which males are attractive, very male-looking faces are not consistently attractive, and modern researchers are much less sure as to what underlies the attractive male face. LINH TRAN BRINCAT

SENSE OF PLACE

Straight from France, Sensing opens this month at the new Fairmont Battery Wharf development. The restaurant is led by celebrated French chef Guy Martin, who founded the original Sensing in Paris in 2006. Boston may seem like a strange place to settle, but recall the pilgrim model of franchising—set up shop on the Massachusetts shore and hope for the best. It seemed to work well last time.

The kitchen at the 80-seat venue will be led by Gérard Barbin, whose English after just eight months of immersion will humble anyone who studied French in high school. Barbin, 25, honed his craft with Martin (a name always preceded by "chef Guy") at the Paris Sensing and the historic Le Grand Véfour (a name always followed by "three-star Michelin," although it lost a star last year). Tapped as the chef de cuisine, he worked with his mentor to develop the menu. "I did some testing in Paris, and every day chef Guy Martin tried with me the food and would say change this or try that," he says. "He just asked me to keep the spirit of Sensing."

Which is? "We try to take one product, very simple, but excite it in a different way." This approach translates into duck foie gras terrine with pickles, beet jelly and beet salad ($19) and a dessert of lime sorbet under a lemon and yuzu crystalline ($11). The blueprint was designed with elasticity and aims to promote locality, a trait that should develop as Barbin familiarizes himself with the area. "In France, I had never seen a smoked mussel, so I said 'I can adapt my recipe.'" And now a smoked mussel with beet tartare appears on the Sensing snacking platter ($19). "It's the same concept in Paris—I must keep the local spirit."

PEDESTRIAN CROSSING

TO THE MAN IN WORKOUT SHORTS outside the Davis Square Boston Sports Club:
"Excuse you" is neither a graceful nor appropriate remark to snarl when you're walking down the wrong side of the sidewalk, and you encounter an oncoming pedestrian who simply stops instead of jumping submissively out of your aggressive way. Until you undergo some therapy for your right/left dysfunctionality, mind your manners. And do consider consulting a proctologist for [an anal cranialectomy]. Believe me, pal, it's overdue.

Keep Walking

To the tourists with no sense of direction in the North End:
Upon arriving, you make it your mission to find cannolis. It may be a surprise, but walking backwards while clogging up the tiny sidewalks doesn't make people like you. In fact, I hate you. Last week, as I trudged down Hanover Street, one of you walked out of Mike's Pastry directly in front of me and just stood there. I abruptly stopped so we wouldn't collide. You still proceeded to stand in my way, looking around like a ferret searching for its food. I really hope that you're blind, because then I might feel bad for wanting to punch you in the face.

Sidewalk Police

To the woman who found my wallet:
On New Year's Eve, I dropped my wallet into a quasi-frozen puddle outside of my friend's house in JP where it slept under water until you found it the next day. You then transported it to your house half-way across the state of Massachusetts, where the T is only known as an herbal beverage. Somehow, you managed to contact my father in Rhode Island and told him that his son (once again) had lost something of great value in, what my father mistakenly calls, "The Big Apple."

Since I cancelled all of my cards that morning and spent my last dime on taxicab fare the night before, what you found was worth no more than a slightly ripped, half-frozen faux-leather wallet with 75 cents remaining on a Dunkin' Donuts gift card that may or may not work now due to water damage. Although there was a great deal of explaining to do to my father regarding the goings-on of that evening, you did save me an excruciatingly long wait in the DMV for a new license.

For that, I am eternally grateful and forever in your debt!

Sincerely,

CLIP ART

If only the mustache's moment would end as fast as a celebrity marriage. But for those of you who take style cues from Brad Pitt, we offer the following gallery of options. As a general grooming rule: The more ironic, the better.

Upgrade

GOOD CARMA

There's a hole in the car market. If you want something posh and fun to drive that doesn't dump CO2 into the atmosphere like a coal-fired power plant, your options remain slim. The Lexus GS450h hybrid, for example, gets only 25 miles per gallon on the highway—2 mpg less than a non-hybrid Cadillac CTS. The Ford Fusion and Toyota Camry hybrids are quite virtuous, but not exactly what you'd call sporty. So, as horrendous as the auto industry is right now, BMW should find at least modest success with a new car that aims to bridge the gap between the Priuses and the Porsches.

Here's what you need to know about the 2009 BMW 335d: it's a 3-series, so it's inherently good to drive, and it's a diesel, so it gets 23 mpg city and 36 mpg highway. With 265 horsepower and as much torque as your average short bus, the 335d with an automatic transmission is actually faster than the 328i gas model with a stick-shift—zero to 60 in six seconds flat. The only mildly wonky thing about it is that you have to refill an onboard urea tank roughly every 15,000 miles (injection of urea, a main component of urine, helps the emissions equipment meet U.S. standards). But hey, even then, you get to make jokes about peeing in the gas tank, which seems like a bonus. EZRA DYER

On a father's suicide and a tobacco shop

Sense of the Senseless

SUICIDE IS A KIND of double death—the actual loss and the everlasting, painful wondering why. To ponder her dad's decision to kill himself in 1991, Joan Wickersham invented an "index," approaching the question with spikes going every which way. Sections include "Attempt to imagine" and "Concern that he will be viewed differently now." There's also "Finding some humor in," "Ashes" and "Valentine's Day." Her obliquely melancholy father had shaming money problems at the end. He also battled jealousy over his wife's sparkly flirtation with a fashion designer and a tightly coiled history of vicious beatings by his own dad in childhood. Wickersham addresses these things, attempting to understand his violent act. Bravely hurt, stoically wary, she explores how the past gets rewritten by a suicide, and considers the many direct and indirect aftermaths. Her keen novelist's eye makes this memoir, on an impossibly sad subject, a literary gem full of characters, conflicts and pinpointed scenes, as when Wickersham thinks she spots her dead father at Cardullo's. She ends with "Where I am now."
The Suicide Index: Putting My Father's Death in Order by Cambridge writer Joan Wickersham was a finalist for the National Book Award.

WAITING TO INHALE TOBACCO CENTRAL IN CAMBRIDGE

Thank You for Smoking

AS NICOTINE USE BECOMES more restricted, this historic tobacco shop blows smoke rings of luscious atmosphere around its loyal constituents. Entering Leavitt & Peirce is like walking onto a period set. Inside, big glass jars hold their additive-free custom pipes and cigarette-rolling tobaccos with romantic names like Whiskey Cavendish and Dark Honey. Intensely gazing shoppers, many of them women, contemplate the tobaccos, fat cigars and beautiful curly wooden pipes—one in the shape of Winston Churchill. Warm customer service adds to the old-fashioned allure here, as do the somehow-related items: an old toy roller coaster, fluffy badger shaving brushes, cigarette cases (that could hold money), fancy soaps and donkey-topped walking sticks. They all suggest a cosmopolitan charmer who smokes. Up above, an intimate balcony, decorated with ancient pictures of Harvard football teams (not a smokingland anymore), offers chess games for a small fee. Hey, nonsmokers—come enjoy the retro flavor! It's delicious.
Leavitt & Peirce (1316 Mass. Ave, Cambridge, 617-547-0576), one of Harvard Square's oldest shops, has sold tobacco since 1883.

Maine Shrimp
$5.99/lb. at Whole Foods Markets. Also available at other local shops.

Purveyors

Through Shell and High Water

Maine fishermen have faced rough waters this year with the tanking price of lobster. But just as seafood season seemed likely to sink, they were buoyed by a small, sweet addition to their crop: coral-colored Maine shrimp. Unlike their warmer-water brethren, these swimmers are truly shrimpy (40–70 to the pound) and their prices even more so (as low as $1 per pound off the boat). Best of all, the season spans a record 180 days: Dec. 1–May 29. Enjoy the shrimp sautéed in olive oil, blanched and dunked in butter or, best of all, sucked from their shells.

THREE ITALIANS AND A POLE WALK INTO A BAR....

IT'S NO JOKE: the three Italians are brothers Dante, Filippo and Damian deMagistris; the pole is actually an old firehouse pole; and the bar will be the very first in the town of Belmont, inside the trio's forthcoming restaurant, Il Casale... which is itself being built inside the old Belmont Fire House.

"I want to say we're two months out [from opening]," says Filippo deMagistris, who directs the wine program at Restaurant Dante and co-owns both eateries with his brothers. In the works for more than a year now, Il Casale is a major project, with 130 seats divided among the dining room, seasonal sidewalk patio, and bar and lounge areas. "We're going to reinstall the original firehouse pole," deMagistris says. Any plans for pole dancing? "No! Then again, it might be good for business," he adds with a laugh.

"I'M NOT A FOOD SNOB," James Beard wrote, "and I enjoy good cooking wherever I find it." Would he have found it at mega-mall Patriot Place in Foxborough? Well, yes, according to the powers-that-be at the James Beard House. They've invited the executive chef of Tastings Wine Bar & Bistro, a restaurant at Patriot Place, to prepare a special menu at the New York landmark. Richard Garcia, an honors graduate of the U.S. Marine Corps Food Service Academy and U.S. Army Quartermaster School for Food Service, will showcase his "upscale, small-plate cuisine" in partnership with Duckhorn Wine Company on April 4.

WHEN BAD THINGS HAPPEN to good restaurants: Franklin Southie has reopened its doors following a minor mishap involving a decorative panel that fell from the ceiling, slightly injuring several diners. This spurred local media to glom onto the story and "beat [the situation] to death," co-owner Dave Dubois says. "Our big concern was for our patrons." Now, "the whole ceiling has been changed," and it's time to return the focus to the food.

IN A GOOD POSITION

The Mandarin Oriental's Asana is off to a solid start.

CLASS ACTS Sea scallops and executive chef Nicholas Boutin

COMPETING BUSINESS aphorisms speak to the potential success of one of the Back Bay's newest and grandest developments. Will the efficacy of "location, location, location" win out over "timing is everything"? The owners of the Mandarin Oriental, Boston, are counting on the former, hoping that their Boylston Street address overcomes the shadow that 2008's financial meltdown cast on the hotel's economic prospects—and its restaurant Asana. This upscale eatery exudes luxury in its decor and furnishings. Remarkably, that luxury comes at a steal, with a recent three-course dinner for four, including two bottles of wine, costing less than $300, a bargain when compared to local competitors on the hotel scene.

At its best, the creations of French-trained and Hong Kong–seasoned executive chef Nicholas Boutin delighted and satisfied. Fresh house-baked bread—gossamer toasts were our favorites—came with sweet Vermont butter. Marinated Atlantic salmon ($14), cured with citrus and dill, excelled in texture and flavor, its accompanying crème fraîche and extra-virgin olive-oil enhancing both the fish and its garnish of baby potatoes.

Clam chowder ($9), although lacking the flavor of bacon, nevertheless pleased with its creamy richness. Even better was the macaroni and cheese ($5), an affordable side dish I enjoyed as a pasta starter one night.

Asana's fusion entrees were a mixed bag. A main course of nasi goreng ($28), Indonesian fried rice, arrived in an eye-catching black cauldron, its toothsome mix of grains, garlic, chopped shrimp and shrimp crackers enlivened with soy sauce, chili paste and Asian spices. A sunny-side-up egg, its yolk soft but not runny, provided a tasty protein, but the skewers of dry chicken on the side added nothing of interest to the otherwise delicious dish. Not so delicious was the "dumpling selection" ($10), six dry, bland gyozas with thick, doughy skins, unredeemed by the accompanying dipping sauces. Roasted duck with pancake ($27) scored slightly better with good gamey flavor and an aromatic combination of spices, but its slightly tough, dry texture disappointed. Hence, this trio of fusion preparations batted only .333, a good average in baseball but minor league in a restaurant.

The other main courses I sampled—short ribs ($34), lamb shank ($31) and sea scallops ($36)—batted .667, with only the ribs striking out. Reading its menu description set my mouth watering—"slow-cooked and seared" with caramelized endive, green apple and red-wine sauce—but the execution was flawed. The rib bones were removed at some point in its preparation, resulting in an almost leaden block of meat that couldn't be rescued by the excellent sauce. In contrast, the huge lamb shank was slow-roasted to succulent, fall-off-the-bone perfection, which was brought to life by an accompanying scallion yogurt dip. The scallops needed no rescuing. Simply sautéed in butter "meunière style," they shined without enhancement.

Pistachio crème brûlée

While Asana prices its wines by the glass aggressively, bottles came as low as $30, with a number of superior selections under $40. These included 2008 Greenhough Nelson sauvignon blanc from New Zealand ($35), a vibrant, well-balanced choice that tingled on the tongue, and 2006 Rosso di Altesino ($39), a fruity but structured sangiovese from Tuscany. Desserts, all $10, were consistently spectacular, each one surpassing the one before. The most conventional, except in its presentation as dual cubes, was the apple pie. Two others had savory aspects: réglisse panna cotta, with the perfume of olive oil, and fig clafoutis, baked pancake-batter laced with fruit and a soupçon of basil. Pistachio crème brûlée, with its nutty, creamy flavor and texture, didn't make it around the table, disappearing in a nanosecond.

The triumphs of Asana's desserts provided a fitting denouement to an enjoyable dinner. It was served with courtesy and grace, maximum attentiveness and an obvious desire to please. While the restaurant has some formidable competition nearby—L'Espalier and Sel de la Terre—it seems off to a good start, economy be damned. Those who order well will leave satisfied and with enough money in their pockets for a future night out. ×××

STOP THE H8

Anonymous smack on the Internet is plain pathetic.

A FEW DAYS INTO 2009, I opened my e-mail to find a comment from YouTube. Posted anonymously at 1 am through a new account, it concerned a video of me trying out the waterslides at the CoCo Key water park, which was part of an old WCVB-TV5 Chronicle segment about The Improper. The comment read, "From the looks of that Donald Trump comb-forward, this dude ought to be looking into a Hair Club for Men membership.... I'm not only a douchebag, I'm also balding at 30!"

You might ask if I'm doing OK after having my luscious locks so maliciously denigrated. Well, I'm fine, and here's why: People who post anonymous smack on the Internet are the most useless organisms on the planet. If you care what these people say about you online, you may as well care about the opinion of a tapeworm crawling out of a stray dog's butt, because each one has the same amount of credibility.

For instance, the YouTube video in question is titled something like, "Ezra Goes Waterslide-ing." So to find it, you're either Googling me at 1 am—which means you probably want to wear my skin as a suit—or you're looking for waterslide videos and are thus a pedophile. Either way, if you're setting up a new YouTube account in the middle of the night for the express purpose of anonymously taunting me, you're obviously one of life's major achievers.

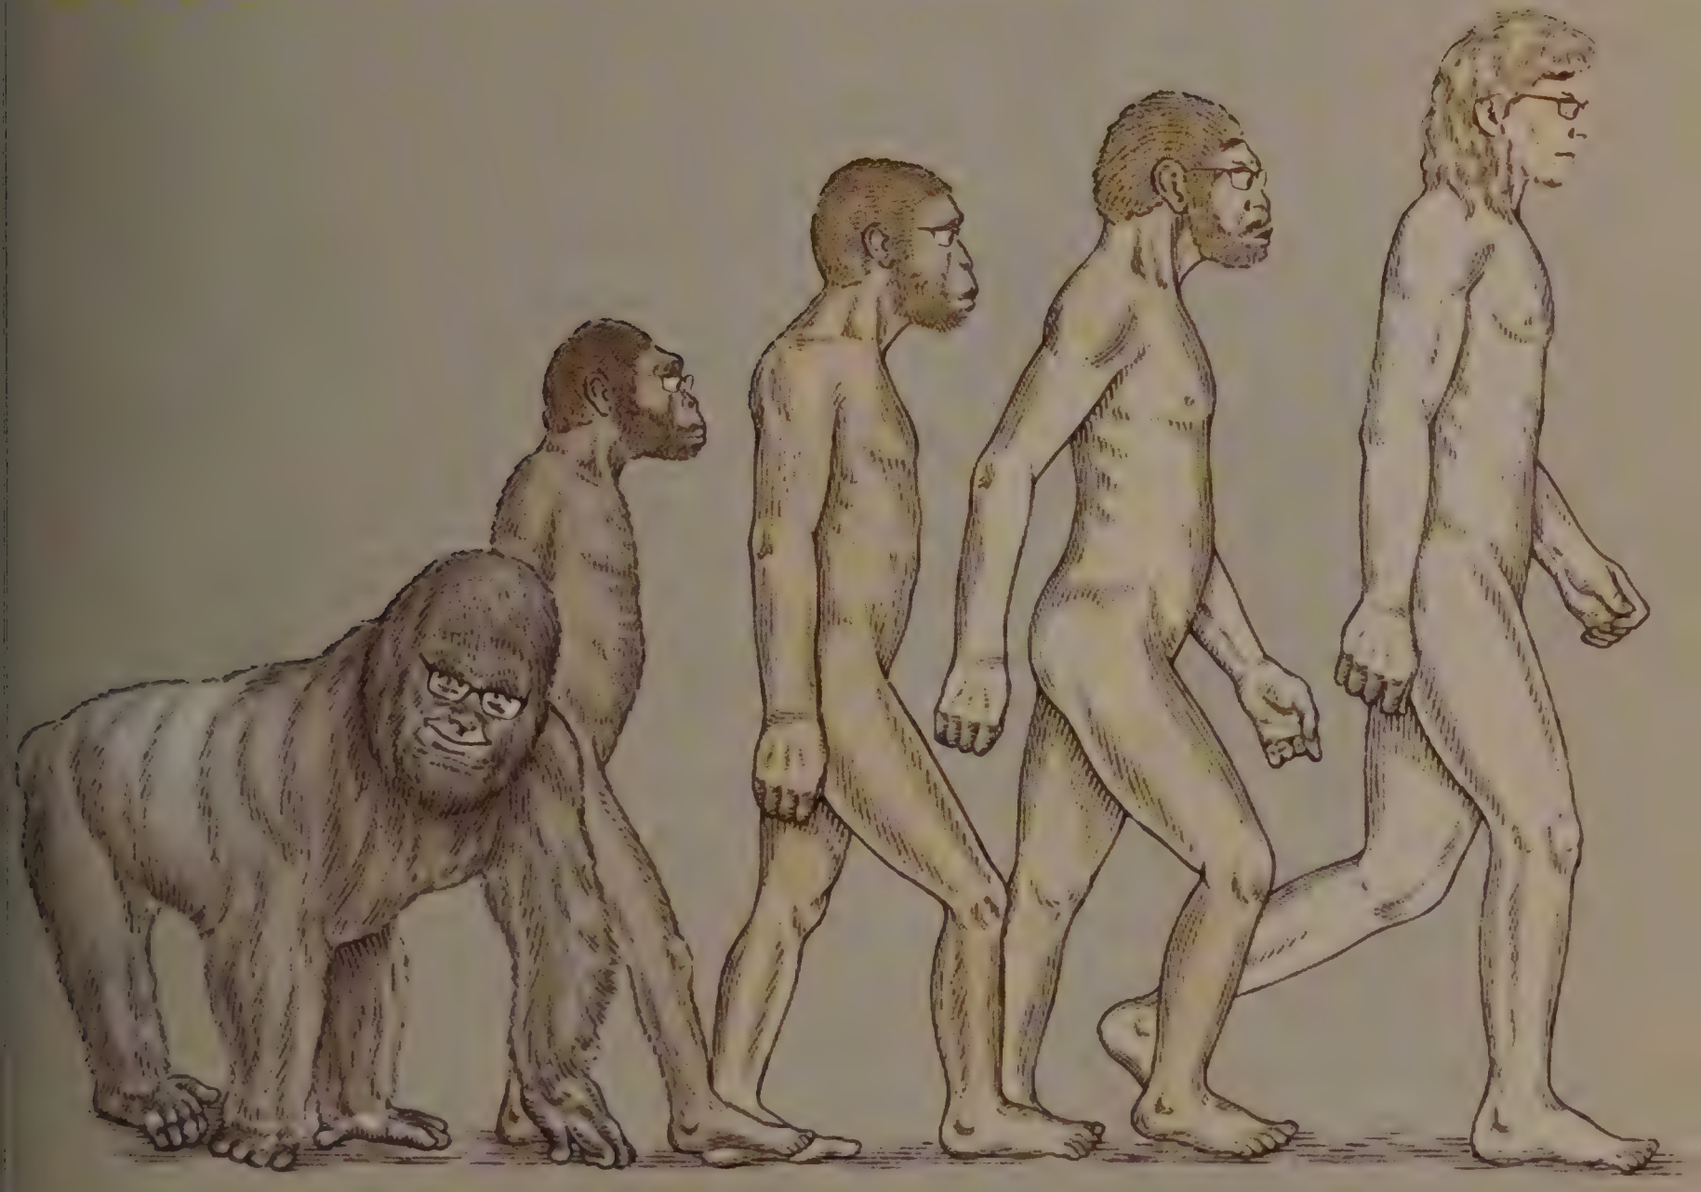
A few months back, Tennessee State banned the anonymous gossip Web site JuicyCampus. The incredible thing to me isn't that Tennessee State would ban a Web site, but that anyone would care what's written on such a forum. Talking crap about people online isn't exactly new, and if you can't use JuicyCampus, there's always Don'tDateHimGirl or Craigslist, or a million other ways to defame and insult someone.

To see if JuicyCampus was really any worse than all the other sites, I checked out the posts for my alma mater. Overwhelmingly, the main target of JuicyCampus comments was JuicyCampus itself. One post was titled, "You know what type of people I find attractive? Female bodybuilders." Someone else hoped to get a discussion going on "Most avuncular lunch lady." I bet I'd find that pretty witty, if I knew what "avuncular" meant.

You may as well care about the opinion of a tapeworm crawling out of a dog's butt.

Of course, it wasn't all highbrow. There was one thread asking people to name overrated lacrosse girls, a discussion that culminated with a post reading, "You're a bitch, Jessica!" What Jessica and her adversary are missing here is that this whole catfight was likely instigated by some hideous troll who hates all the lacrosse girls. Because, as we all know, lacrosse girls are hot and popular. But instead of saying, "You know what? This was probably written by some Cheetos-covered Jabba the Hutt who looks like the spawn of the bearded lady and Lobster Boy, so who cares?" they went for each other's throats. Doubtless while Lobster Boy clapped his claws in glee.

Faceless electronic subterfuge isn't a novel concept. Around 2001, my then-girlfriend confronted me with an anonymous e-mail claiming that I was cheating on her. I wasn't, and said as much, but the hatefulness of the thing was unsettling, because it obviously came from someone we knew. But I didn't lose any sleep over it, because I rationalized it thus: If it came from a guy, he was trying to break us up because he had the hots for my girlfriend. If it came from a girl, then she was trying to break us up because she had the hots for me. Either way, the root cause was our own essential irresistibility. So, toast to that!



Going back even further, a disgruntled reader once anonymously menaced me the old-fashioned way: over voicemail, with messages claiming that if he ever saw me on the street, he'd punch me in the face. Again, I didn't worry about it, because if you're too ball-less to tell me your name, I doubt that you're the type who's prone to fisticuffs. I speak with some authority, because the last time I got into a physical altercation, it was with a large, bearded man named George who tried to strangle me for trespassing in Cos Cob, Conn.—long story, that. In my experience, anonymous threats are harmless, but George will reach inside your car window and grab your windpipe if he thinks you just did a burnout in his driveway.

To anyone who's been anonymously character-assassinated online, I'd say take it with a grain of salt. Because it's not Tom Brady and Gisele sitting there composing snide remarks about you on JuicyCampus or Craigslist. It's people whose own tragic loserdom is so crippling they can't even put their name on a YouTube account. Besides, good or bad, at least you're on the radar. There's a Fall Out Boy lyric that applies: "I don't care what you think, as long as it's about me." ✖✖✖

BAD BEHAVIOR

Parties bring out the worst in men.

I'M ALL TOO HAPPY to make 2008 a distant memory, which means finding ways to forget last year's disastrous climate—like attending parties. Which has me recalling parties from the past where outrageous behavior occurred. I'd rather remember that outrageous behavior than the shenanigans of the same variety on Wall Street. For those sad people, greed and stupidity are a terrible combination.

Does anyone remember "coming out" parties? I'm not condoning such "horror shows," as they used to be called. I'm just an observer, reporting the absurdities of life. And I was at a famous one—Lester Lanin played and three generations got drunk as skunks, pumping their elbows in time to Cole Porter and Rodgers & Hart. Everyone tried the Charleston and shouted out the lyrics, "It's the wrong time and the wrong place / Though your face is charming, it's the wrong face." I saw a group of handsome trust-fund boys carrying several cases of champagne through the dining room. "Helping out the hostess," I thought at the time. I later learned they removed the bubbly and stowed it in their car trunks. But the capper was when the party's debutante was called to the microphone by the bandleader, accompanied by inebriated cheering. As she began to thank her parents, a big bear of a young man in his father's white tie and tails came onstage and pulled her dress over her head. People had to drag the big bear away.

Several years later, I was at a party in New York. It was thrown by a friend's parents, prominent in the publishing world. Americans, spotting a good thing, have always wanted in—hence, wedding and party crashers. It's easy to crash a party when friends of friends can drop names and enter. At this gathering, jazz from several speakers spilled over the scene. People poured their own drinks, hard stuff like gin and tonics, Jim Beam, Mount Gay and soda. Which, I suppose, led to two crashers opening a living-room window seven stories above Park Avenue and tossing a marble coffee table into the night. Miraculously no one was killed. Chaos ensued; police were summoned, but the jazz played on.

Bad behavior can occur at your own home as well. My wife and I lived in the suburbs early in our marriage. We always believed in mixing it up at parties, inviting friends who didn't know each other, hoping to enliven the experience. We gave a dinner one Saturday night for 10 people, including a securities trader and his wife, a woman in the flower business whose husband developed real estate, a travel writer married to an estate lawyer and an heiress whose husband dealt in antiques. Several students from a local college helped with drinks and serving. One of them said to me, just before dinner, "That man over there asked for a dry martini."

"And?" I replied.

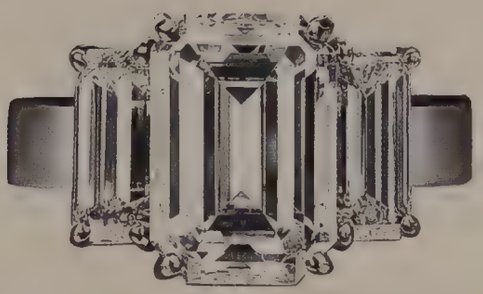
"And it's his fourth."

"Oops," I answered. "I'll take care of it." He was the securities trader who ran the buy-and-sell desk for a giant mutual fund. Securities firms kissed his butt, vying for business. In those days, perks were rampant, and he collected them like tribute: ball games, golfing trips to Ireland, dinners everywhere. "Ease up, big boy," I told him. "I want your opinion on the wines, and you're an inch away from not tasting anything." This was his first visit to our house, and I had no idea about his punishment of the gin.

"Right, pal," he said, further endearing himself to me. His wife, my better half's new tennis partner, was the reason they were there. Dinner was lively and seemed to be going well when the trader said, "Games are fun. We play a game when we're all at bars after work to see who pays for drinks."

He was sitting next to the heiress, who gushed, "I love games." This game involved counting, a little like Liar's Poker without cards.

After a few rounds, the trader said to the heiress, "You dumb shit." Her husband threw a glass of wine, luckily white, into the trader's face. Everyone at the table jumped up, the trader's wife running from the table in tears.



Needless to say, the party was over with all the innocent guests saying to us, "Hey, what a success. We'll never forget this one." When we shut the door on the last departing couple, my wife commented, "Well, at least we have all the dessert to ourselves."

"And the red wine, too."

"So the glass is half full." We laughed, the best late-night medicine for bad behavior. ✖✖✖

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON CHARA AND ASANTE, RONDO AND JIM ED RICE

2-PART PATRIOTS WISH LIST

Missing: A Pick Six... The Patriots defense scored as many touchdowns as you did last season. In fact, the Pats were the only team in the NFL not to get at least six points from their other half. Apologies to Ellis Hobbs (not really), but watching Asante Samuel this post-season only serves as a harsh reminder of the importance of a legitimate playmaker in the secondary.

Good-bye My Loooove!... It's a sad day when you have to officially give up on a player you've spent so many years rooting and making excuses for, but what are we going to do? Michael Gaines, the Detroit Lions back-up tight end, had better numbers than Ben Watson this year. Who the hell is Michael Gaines!? It's time for a new TE.

3 Celtics Specialists

Leon Powe—The In-Traffic Rebound... Powe's an undersized power forward with average leaping ability, but if there's a rebound in the air—and a crowd below—he's getting the ball. Every time. The funny thing is, Powe mistimes his jump on about 80 percent of his rebounds. And in reality, all that does is slightly level the playing field.

Doc Rivers—The In-Bound Play Design... You wouldn't think that an NBA coach could be that much better than everyone else at designing in-bound plays, but Doc Rivers is. He could've drawn up the D-Day invasion during a 20-second timeout.

Rajon Rondo—The Save the Clock Ball Roll... The strategy is by no means novel, but no one's ever taken it to Rondo's extreme. Don't want to step up to the ball? Fine, he'll let it roll to the three-point line. Try to make a move? He grabs the rock and now both your ankles are broken. Better luck next time, opposing point guard.

TOP 5 '09 STORYLINES (SO FAR)

Moving On... With the failures of Romeo Crennel, Charlie Weis and the Mangenius, Bill Belichick's football family tree has no branches and a pack of rabid squirrels living inside it. In 2009, Scott Pioli and Josh McDaniels hope to provide some Miracle-Gro. For the sake of BB's legacy, we're thankful neither guy went to Detroit. That could be the second-worst job in America after "Eddy Curry's Limo Driver."

Bruins Keep Rolling... If you weren't already sold on this year's Bruins, their mid-January manhandling of the Canadiens should've sealed the deal. In a game they traditionally find a way to lose, the B's not only won, but physically dominated the Habs on both ends—and Zdeno Chara's "Drago on Ice" performance was his most memorable of the season.

The Red Sox Response... "OK, Yankees. We'll see your Sabathia, Teixeira and Burnett, and raise you Smoltz, Penny and Rocco Baldelli. What? What do you mean that's not enough? Fine, how 'bout if we throw in... um... Ramon Ramirez?"

Celtics Struggle... One week they're the '96 Bulls, the next they're more reminiscent of the '96 Celtics. And while a double dose of Vitamin Raptor seems to have shot the Ubuntu back into them, we pray the C's learned a lesson or two from their post-Christmas cramps. A few of those efforts were grosser than Andy Reid.

Jim Rice: Hall of Famer... It took 15 years, but the Baseball Writers' Association finally found the clarity to recognize one of the most dangerous hitters of the '70s and '80s. Either that or they just felt bad; regardless, it's great to see Jim Ed finally receive the credit he deserves—but would've been even greater had Rice, in turn, given the press what it deserved: "No comment."

4 DATES TO WATCH

1/22 The Celtics play a big one in Orlando, as they attempt to re-establish their Eastern Conference rep. Plus, if there's time, the team promised Big Baby he could go see Universal's new Toy Story exhibit.

1/25 Montreal hosts the 2009 NHL All-Star Game, starring Bruins Zdeno Chara, Marc Savard and Tim Thomas. Stick around after the game as one lucky fan gets the chance to Zamboni the ice with Barry Merlose's mullet!

2/1 Boom! He's on your TV! John Madden and Al Michaels call Super Bowl XLIII in Tampa, and even though the Pats didn't get a shot in the postseason this year, we'll take solace in absolutely nothing.

2/2 The 57th annual Beanpot Tournament—held at TD Banknorth Garden—gets off to a controversial start when BC fires head coach Jerry York during pre-game warm-ups for "staring a little bit too long" at the Bruins' Stanley Cup banners.

1 ONE RANDOM THOUGHT

With every passing season, it grows increasingly frustrating to look back on the Patriots 2006 AFC Championship choke job and its effect on Peyton Manning's legacy. He'll go down in history as an NFL immortal. But if it weren't for that one lousy half, he'd be a bigger loser than Gerry Callahan.

C.WHETZEL

Soroff On CHRIS WALLACE

The Fox News host chats about inauguration parties, Obama jokes and Sean Hannity's smirk.

THE HOST AND MODERATOR OF FOX NEWS SUNDAY, Chris Wallace, 61, is a veteran journalist who has interviewed or covered every major political figure and event of the past 30 years. The son of legendary 60 Minutes anchor Mike Wallace, he was raised primarily by his stepfather, CBS News president Bill Leonard. A native of Chicago, he graduated from Harvard University and worked at The Boston Globe before making the move to TV by joining NBC News in 1975. While there, Wallace served as chief White House correspondent and moderator of Meet the Press. From NBC, he moved to ABC, where he worked for 14 years and received a prestigious duPont-Columbia Award for journalism. He has also won three Emmys and a Peabody Award. Wallace and his wife, Lorraine, live in the Washington, D.C., area; he has six children.

Jonathan Soroff: So is Fox News really "fair and balanced"?

Chris Wallace: Absolutely, but in a different way than our detractors think we mean it. We don't wink or snicker at that phrase. We think it means something, specifically that we tell all sides of the story in a way that a lot of the mainstream media [do] not.

How about two other adjectives to describe it?
Astute and insightful.

Is Roger Ailes a barrel of laughs?
He is, as a matter of fact. He's also the best boss I've ever worked for.

Do you call Rupert Murdoch "Uncle Rupie"?
[Laughs.] Ah, no. I call him Mr. Murdoch, and so does everybody else.

Think he'd lend me a few million bucks?
I don't think Rupert Murdoch lends anybody money.

Can you truly say that you're proud to work alongside Sean Hannity?
I respect him. We do different things, and he's very valuable to the network. I generally agree with him, even if I don't always agree with his approach.

What's with his smirk? He's always smirking.
You know Bill Clinton in our interview very famously accused me of smirking. I think sometimes people are unjustly accused of smirking when, in fact, it's a smirk-free zone.

Nancy Grace. Is she insane or just on the wrong medication?
I don't watch her, so I don't have to worry about it.

True or false about your Harvard classmates: Al Gore invented the Internet?
False, and he regrets having suggested it.

Tommy Lee Jones became an actor to get laid.
I don't think he needed to be an actor to do that.

Did you ever feel competitive with your father?
I think I felt very competitive much earlier in my career. But first of all, if you're the child of somebody very famous, at some point you either have to come to terms with that, or it'll eat you up. A long time ago, I came to terms with the fact that I'm not Mike Wallace and neither is anybody else. As time has gone on, I frankly have succeeded way beyond what I ever dreamt of, so I'm a happy man.

Was it weird that your stepfather was your father's boss?
It was. I'd have conversations with one, and he'd say not to tell the other one. Not that they bad-mouthed each other. It was just opinions or information that an employee didn't want his boss to know, or vice versa. So I got pretty good at keeping secrets.

Most impressive president in history?
I guess Lincoln.

Most impressive president you've met?
Reagan.

Do you still read The Boston Globe*?*
When I'm up at my father's house in Martha's Vineyard in the summer.

Is print journalism dead?
No, but it really is going to have to figure out a way to survive in the 21st century.

Finish this riddle: Barbara Walters and Diane Sawyer walk onto an elevator, and it gets stuck between floors...
Neither comes out alive.

Would you rather be lost in the woods with Condoleezza Rice and Laura Bush or Michelle Obama and Hillary Clinton?
I'd probably have a better time with Condi and Laura, and I'd probably have a better chance of surviving with Hillary and Michelle.

Heard any good Obama jokes lately?
No! And I think a lot of people are worried that he's not especially funny, and there doesn't seem to be much that's funny about him.

Do you think he's going to get kid-glove treatment because people don't want to be perceived as racist?
No. I think that one of the best things about his presidency is that over time we will become increasingly color-blind, and he will be treated, for good or ill, just like every other president.

So are you a regular at inaugural balls?
The last place I'd want to be is at an inaugural ball. I went to one in 1977 when Jimmy Carter was inaugurated, and it was the worst. If your idea of fun is 5,000 people in tuxedos and gowns, standing around in a ballroom and having to buy drinks at a cash bar, waiting around for the five minutes when the president and new first lady show up, then you're in seventh heaven.

Any thoughts on Michelle Obama's dress on election night?
I'd give it a B-minus.

Three adjectives to describe the prospect of Obama as president?
Exciting, inspirational and overhyped.

Once you've got Washington on your hands, is it impossible to wash off?
No, some people leave happily. I, on the other hand, have been here 30 years, and it's like that line from Apocalypse Now: "I love the smell of napalm in the morning." I can wake up with a good political scandal brewing and breathe it in and just sigh with satisfaction. ✖✖✖

SMOOTH OPERATOR

RAY ALLEN HAS ALL THE RIGHT MOVES.

BY RICH LEVINE PHOTOGRAPHS BY KERRY BRETT

AS PRACTICE DRAWS TO A CLOSE AT THE CELTICS' Waltham training facility, the players break into small groups, hovering around the gym's multiple baskets. At one hoop, Brian Scalabrine and Sam Cassell face off in a casual, and inherently hilarious, game of one-on-one. At another, the great Clifford Ray works with Kendrick Perkins on the big man's ever-expanding offensive arsenal. On the opposite side, Patrick O'Bryant is hard at work on his fadeaway baseline three-pointer. Hey, you never know.

Then there's Ray Allen, who stands calmly and quietly at one of the foul lines, working the hell out of the net. Catch. Breathe. Release. Swish. Over and over. A general end-of-practice lightheartedness fills the room on this winter afternoon, but Allen's more serious than Christian Bale. All he sees is the rim. Catch. Breathe. Release. Swish.

At one point, Eddie House creeps up behind him and assumes the role of Sidney Deane—trying to psyche out Billy Hoyle and hop the next bus to Sizzler. He whispers in Allen's ear, even waves his hand in front of the future Hall of Famer's eyes. Allen, a 12-year NBA vet, barely notices. Swish, and your mother's an astronaut.

"When I work out, I'm working out like I'm playing a game," he tells us. "When I'm out in practice, I'm in a game. I'm in a specific situation. Really, I'm training my mind as much as I'm training my body, so when it comes to game time and I have to go make a couple free throws, I just go back to that place in my mind where I'm in the gym with nobody watching."

A creature of habit, Allen, 33, has used that focus and mind/body philosophy to become one of the best pure shooting guards of the last 20 years. Since being selected by Minnesota with the fifth pick in the 1996 NBA Draft—incidentally, smack-dab between Stephon Marbury and Antoine Walker—the UConn alum has averaged 21 points a game and made eight All-Star teams; he ranks second in all-time three pointers and sixth in all-time free-throw percentage. And, of course, he recently won his first league title.

But while his athletic achievements are many, Ray Allen wouldn't be Ray Allen without the silky, Usher-smooth manner in which he operates. Watching him slash to the hoop, the team looks like it's playing on ice and Allen's the only one wearing skates—although Rajon Rondo probably keeps an extra pair in his locker. But even if his game can, at times, appear effortless, Allen's quick to point out that none of what he's accomplished has been easy, or heaven forbid, predestined.

"A long time ago, somebody told me that they thought God had blessed me with a jump shot, and the ability to be a great NBA player. That surprised me. I was like, 'Do you really believe that?' God blessed me with health, a healthy family and the ability to go out and find for myself what I wanted to do. He granted me with the competitive drive to want to be the best and the sound mind to accomplish my goals. But that came through focus and dedication, not from some God-given right."

"IN ORDER TO BE SUCCESSFUL IN THIS LEAGUE, IT'S THOSE SMALL, LITTLE PLAYS THAT YOU HAVE TO EXECUTE."

If God didn't bless Allen with a jump shot, he did bless Boston sports fans with Allen's presence. There's no need to expound on what the Allen trade—and subsequently, the trade—did for the Celtics franchise. One summer Paul Pierce is demanding his way out of town, the next he's on the road for two months with the Finals MVP trophy superglued to his right hand.

But that's the past. We're looking at the present. The Celtics kicked off this season playing at a level some felt surpassed that of last June, and Allen was at the forefront. He was the team's leading scorer during Boston's historic 19-game win streak and has proven to the rest of the league that after what was—by his standards—a tepid first season in Boston, he's healthy and rejuvenated. "Physically, my body's in a much better place than it was last year," he says.

The aforementioned streak was fun, but now that the Celtics have returned to Earth, and talk of 72 wins has gone the way of Jeff Van Gundy's hairline, the team can get back to business. Repeat business. The Cavs look like the biggest threat to the Eastern Conference throne, while the Lakers are hungry for a Finals rematch out west. Certainly, the C's know these things, but they don't give them too much credence.

"Each game is a new challenge, and we don't really worry about those other teams," Allen says. "We can't afford to do that. We lost a couple games this season where we could have/should have won, but there were two or three plays down the stretch where they beat us. And ultimately they just beat us. It's over with, and all the things we did well are just negated because of two or three bad plays.

"That's what it boils down to," he continues. "You know, in order to be successful in this league, it's those small, little plays that you have to execute." And that's why Ray Allen stands at the foul line, training his body and—perhaps, more important—his mind for those few plays down the stretch when execution becomes the difference between a win and a loss. Because those very situations exist, when his team needs him most, when Allen expects to have his number called.

Well, unless Patrick O'Bryant's open from three. ✖✖✖

RAY OF LIGHT

Last June, Ray Allen's son, Walker, was diagnosed with juvenile diabetes. Since then, Allen and his wife, Shannon, have taken strides to raise awareness. They held the "Walk for Walker" (part of a nationwide Walk to Cure Diabetes) last October, and this November, they'll cochair Joslin's High Hopes Gala.

"Diabetes is a disease where kids can die from being misdiagnosed," Allen says. "The symptoms are very common among children during the cold season, and we want to make sure parents have the right tools to protect their children."

Newsworthy Bostonians and the movie characters they bring to mind.

BY NANCY GAINES
ILLUSTRATIONS BY CHRISTINA UNG

BOSTON — land of the bean, home of the cod and the odd, has given Hollywood plenty of colorful, real-life characters to chew on. There's the eponymous Strangler. The Brinks robbers. And there's Whitey Bulger, Alan Dershowitz and Jan Schlichtmann, or, as they came to be portrayed in the movies, Jack Nicholson (The Departed), Ron Silver (Reversal of Fortune) and John Travolta (A Civil Action).

Like art imitating gangster life, the future-motion-picture story of murderer John Martorano proves that hits of both kinds keep on coming. Producer Graham King caused a public flap when he bought the rights to the life story of Martorano, who confessed to executing 20 people before serving 12 years and turning government witness.

In a modest homage to this year's Oscar season and the perpetual male proclivity for self-regard, we let our imaginations run wild and paired a dozen notable, or at least newsworthy, Bostonians with their celluloid doubles in the roles and movies they called to mind.

DIM THE LIGHTS. PASS THE POPCORN.

RED SOX GM THEO EPSTEIN IS LT. CMDR. RON HUNTER (DENZEL WASHINGTON) & PREZ/CEO LARRY LUCCHINO IS CAPT. FRANK RAMSEY (GENE HACKMAN) IN CRIMSON TIDE.

Forget The Harvard Crimson. The institution that wears the royal robes hereabouts is the Crimson Hose, aka the Boston Red Sox. The changing of the Sox guard pretty much aped this Jerry Bruckheimer actioner, in which an Ivy League–educated, upstart Navy officer wrests control of a nuclear submarine from a curmudgeonly vet during wartime with an evil empire. Young Epstein, the one-time protégé of the phlegmatic Lucchino, didn't quite mutiny, but he did walk out, in a gorilla suit no less. And when he returned, he was in charge of baseball operations—performing admirably ever since.

OUSTED HARVARD PRESIDENT LARRY SUMMERS, NOW HEAD OF OBAMA'S NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL, IS MELVIN UDALL (JACK NICHOLSON) IN AS GOOD AS IT GETS.

A LOVABLY BRASH and abrasive guy who says ugly, sexist things gets kicked to the curb and triumphs in the end. Summers pissed off a lot of people and was tossed from his post as Harvard president two years ago for wondering out loud if women were programmed to fail as math or science stars. As a colleague once said, here's a man who "thinks with his mouth open." These days, he's fawned over as a "thought leader," landing in the only place where the egos are bigger than at Harvard: the White House.

CELTICS HONCHO DANNY AINGE IS COACH NORMAN DALE (GENE HACKMAN) IN THE CLASSIC HOOSIERS.

WITNESS THE TRIBULATIONS of the most unlikely underdogs—it had been a mere 22 years since the fabled Green hoisted a banner—on their star-crossed path to glory! See the visionary hand assemble the megawatt ensemble that revives the spectacular days of Garden pride! It's brought to you by the same cinematic team responsible for the story of Notre Dame's short but heroic Rudy, starring, of course, Doug Flutie. We cried when they won. All of them.

PATS COACH BILL BELICHICK IS DAVY CROCKETT (BILLY BOB THORNTON) IN THE ALAMO.

Talk about doomed. Leading a once-indestructible-now-ragtag band that didn't make the playoffs, with a legendary, but wounded and hobbling vet (Tom Brady playing Jim Bowie), Belichick remains taciturn, resolute and, to the end, implacable under fire. And he'd look great in a coonskin cap. Of course, Tedy Bruschi would be perfect for the part of Sam Houston, the warrior who takes a lickin' and keeps on tickin'. But he's busy starring in Rocky.

IMPOSTER CLARK ROCKEFELLER IS IMPOSTER FRANK ABAGNALE (LEONARDO DICAPRIO) IN CATCH ME IF YOU CAN.

The Woody Allen–esque Crockefeller, as The Herald dubbed him, aka Christian Karl Gerhartsreiter, isn't exactly a stand-in for sexy swindler DiCaprio, who played the fake who conned millions as a lawyer, pilot and doctor. But so far, the German defrauder, accused kidnapper and person of interest in the possible slayings of a missing California couple has gotten back his cash and gold, and seems on the way to a plea bargain. Call it the Miracle on Ploy Street—which is where he lived. No kidding.

RESTAURATEUR CHRISTOPHER MYERS IS NICK (AARON ECKHART) AND CHEF JOANNE CHANG IS KATE (CATHERINE ZETA-JONES) IN THE CLASSY CULINARY ROMANCE NO RESERVATIONS.

Both spawns of Harvard—Myers the flashy English-lit doctoral student, Chang the precise math and econ genius (take that, Summers)—prospered on the Boston foodie front, he as partner in posh Radius, Via Matta and Great Bay, she as the proprietor of bakery/cafe Flour. Fast friends, the pair merged talents and melded temperaments in 2007 to launch the successful restaurant Myers + Chang. And discovered the sum of their parts: they married a year later.

WRITERS TOM PERROTTA AND DENNIS LEHANE ARE THE TWINS CHARLIE AND DONALD KAUFMAN (NICOLAS CAGE) IN ADAPTATION.

(SO? SCHWARZENEGGER and DeVito didn't look alike either.) Brainy Perrotta of Belmont penned the dark and sardonic novels-turned-movies Election and Little Children. Brainy Lehane of Dorchester did the same with Mystic River, Gone Baby Gone and Shutter Island (renamed Ashecliffe). Separate talents, similar bent—like, say, the split-screen Kaufman twins who pen the adaptation for Adaptation. And we'd have Susan Orlean, of course, doing Meryl Streep as Susan Orlean, except Susan Orlean left town for upstate New York. Maybe she'll make a cameo. But if these guys can't get us out of a convoluted plot, no one can.

UNDERAGE ENTREPRENEUR JAMES CONSTANTINI IS JOEL (TOM CRUISE) IN RISKY BUSINESS.

CONSTANTINI, A SMART-ASS, high-school entrepreneur from Weston, created a knockoff of the Life Is Good slogan made famous by the feel-good business empire. Using money he got from his investment-banker dad, the 17-year-old started parody retailer Life Sucks, Inc., sticking the catchphrase on hats and T-shirts. A lawsuit ensued. But like Cruise's Joel, the little boy had the last dance (perhaps after putting his slogan on tighty whities). Life Is Good dropped its suit (his lawyers were "stiff," says Constantini, now a college freshman at St. Joseph's in Philadelphia), and Life Sucks is thriving.

Some say Guest's saccharine/sour singing duo was modeled after either Bob Dylan and Joan Baez, Johnny Cash and June Carter Cash, or Sonny and Cher. No, we counter. It's Sweet Baby and Vain Girl. Earnest Taylor and warbling Simon may still be hissing at each other decades after their break-up, but we hear they actually performed together at a private benefit last year.

SINGERS CARLY SIMON AND JAMES TAYLOR ARE MICKEY AND MITCH (CATHERINE O'HARA AND EUGENE LEVY) IN CHRISTOPHER GUEST'S GENIUS MOCKUMENTARY A MIGHTY WIND.

PR GURU GEORGE REGAN IS HUSTLER SIDNEY FALCO IN THE 1957 NOIR CLASSIC THE SWEET SMELL OF SUCCESS.

WHAT WOULD A BOSTON cast of characters be without the press agent who'd do anything (and we mean anything) for a client? He's someone who knows where every political and business body has been buried over 35 years on the job. Someone who throws brickbats at powerful public figures—until they hire him. Someone who never forgets a kindness or a snub, pulls favors, gives freebies, terrorizes unwary reporters but, as far as we're aware, doesn't plant evidence to get publicity and wind up arrested (like Falco). But he did almost get tossed in the hoosegow for attacking a guy who "walked" his dog by tying it to a truck. George Regan, take a bow.

Legends of the Ball

Cedric Maxwell and Tommy Heinsohn aren't paid to be impartial. The Celtics legends and color commentators have a clear affinity for the team and city restaurants. On Jan. 29, join them at Fleming's Prime Steakhouse & Wine Bar for dinner, drinks and stories from their playing days. You can also rub shoulders with Celtics great Jo Jo White (who no longer has to worry about keeping the svelte figure you see above). Casually mention the effectiveness of NBA referees and get your money's worth.

Deep Thought

Tricky Dick-tation In 1977, David Frost's historic interviews with Richard Nixon gave the world something close to an apology. (And riddled Barbara Walters with a sense of envy from which she has yet to fully recover.) Peter Morgan's Tony Award–nominated Frost/Nixon recreates the tête-à-tête and features Stacy Keach—acting legend and star of such films as Cheech and Chong's Up in Smoke and Children of the Corn 666—as the 37th president of the United States. Hear the confessions for yourself starting Jan. 27 at Boston's Colonial Theatre.

Capsules by Sean Burns

Bride Wars ★ ½ Finally, a chick flick for people who hate women. This misogynist, painfully unfunny farce stars Kate Hudson and Anne Hathaway as lifelong best friends who find their weddings accidentally scheduled on the same day. In the world of director Gary Winick, such a misunderstanding instantly transforms the ladies into raging monsters who trash their friendship for a spate of mean-spirited, sitcom-like sabotage attempts. Meanwhile, the families sit idly on the sidelines, though any injection of common sense or compromise would resolve everything instantly. Director Winick's previous work includes the equally ugly Tadpole, about a young teen who falls for his stepmother. It's all enough to make you wonder about Winick's sense of healthy dispositions. Are we supposed to believe that characters could really be so craven, materialistic and cruel? And if so, why would we want to watch a movie about them? (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Curious Case of Benjamin Button ★★ David Fincher, the gifted and sardonic director of Fight Club and Zodiac, goes Forrest Gump in this shockingly syrupy take on an old F. Scott Fitzgerald short story. Borrowing the premise and little else from the original work, Button stars Brad Pitt as a quizzical fellow born as a elderly man who ages backwards as the film grinds on. And on. Some gorgeous, state-of-the-art digital effects have been invented to place Pitt's face on all sorts of incongruous bodies, but besides existing as a technical marvel, there's little point to the proceedings. Screenwriter Eric Roth seems to have recycled his Forrest Gump script, changing a few names but keeping the central notion of a bumpkin in a doomed romance naively wandering through blunt historical signposts with a surfeit of cornpone aphorisms. There's no actual conflict as we wait for Pitt to grow young and die, just a lot of pretty pictures, plus the visceral nagging disappointment that a talent as subversive as Fincher's stooped to helming shiny Hollywood sap. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Defiance ★★ Director Edward Zwick, perpetrator of such prestigious snores as Blood Diamond and The Last Samurai, has an uncanny knack for sucking all the excitement out of fascinating real-life stories. Zwick strikes again with Defiance, a stodgy, lugubrious account of the Bielski brothers, who escaped from the Nazi occupation into the Belarusian forest, where they built a makeshift village, teamed up with Russian resistance fighters and protected hundreds from the Holocaust. Daniel Craig stars as Tuvia, who humorlessly assumes command of the refugee camp after his reckless brother Zus (Liev Schreiber) heads out to fight with the Russians. Billy Elliot's Jamie Bell plays another sibling, and there's even an ill-conceived love story tossed in for good measure. In typical Zwick fashion, the over-scaled, curiously bloodless action sequences lack any sense of urgency, and the details of a compelling tale are smothered in Hollywood cheese. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Doubt ★★★ Sometimes subtlety is overrated. Just ask Meryl Streep, who smacks her lips and carves ham as the ferocious Sister Aloysius in John Patrick Shanley's big-screen adaptation of his Pulitzer Prize–winning play. In a Bronx Catholic School circa 1964, Streep's nasty, uptight nun stares daggers at Philip Seymour Hoffman's progressive, freewheeling Father Flynn. But when Flynn's potentially inappropriate relationship with the school's first black student is called into question, we're in for some grand Inside the Actor's Studio explosions. Shanley's meaty moral questionnaire explores the gulf between tradition and modernity in the heightened form of a parable, with Amy Adams' meek Sister James torn between our protagonists. Shanley hasn't directed since 1990's tragically underrated Joe Versus the Volcano, and while his visuals are fairly perfunctory, he's at least wise enough to embrace his own material's inherent staginess, highlighting the broad theatricality of these performances. You'll never forget you're watching a filmed play, but with a cast like this, who can complain? (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Frost/Nixon ★★ ½ In refashioning Peter Morgan's smash 2006 play for the big screen, director Ron Howard made a wise move casting original stars Michael Sheen and Frank Langella. This picture has a ton of problems, but at the very least, Sheen's sly performance as seemingly callow chat-show host David Frost and Langella's towering Tricky Dick have been preserved on film for posterity. Morgan's play positioned Frost's 1977 televised in-

CHASING CHE

Soderbergh and Del Toro revolutionize the biopic.

Che
Starring Benicio Del Toro, Édgar Ramírez, Victor Rasuk, Franka Potente, Julia Ormond and Catalina Sandino Moreno. Written by Peter Buchman. Directed by Steven Soderbergh. At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.

YOU KNOW THE DRILL. This time of year we're always treated to the annual, Oscar-grubbing procession of prestige pictures in which the complex lives of historical figures are simplified into easily digestible beats. Even when the formula is done well, as in Gus Van Sant's jubilant Milk, it's still a formula. But Steven Soderbergh, one of the most restless and ballsy talents around, doesn't care for those constraints.

Sure, Soderbergh can make conventional entertainments as well as anybody, as evidenced by Erin Brockovich or the splendid Ocean's Eleven. But he seems happiest whenever the commercial hits have given him enough wiggle room to run off the terviews with Nixon as a David and Goliath battle, a belated national catharsis in which the wily interrogator tripped the disgraced former president into something close to a mea culpa. Where Howard errs is exactly where this terminally dull filmmaker always errs: He treats his audience like imbeciles. We've got all the makings of a brilliant psychodrama playing out in the loaded glares and strategic statements of Sheen and Langella, yet Howard constantly cuts away to a fake documentary format with a peanut gallery of bit players staring straight into the lens and helpfully explaining everything we've just seen. Thanks, Opie. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Gran Torino ★★★ ½ A throwback to Clint Eastwood's cheap and dirty '80s crowd-pleasers, Gran Torino looks like it was shot over the course of a long weekend and cost about $15 to make. It's also extremely entertaining. Eastwood plays a growling, bigoted Korean War vet who gradually warms to a family of Hmong immigrants living next door. As he sputters, spits and cusses his way through scenes, this mean, old dog learns a few new tricks. The movie is pitched at the same hyperbolic level as Eastwood's oversized turn. Designed as his farewell to acting, the movie plays like catnip for longtime fans. There's a valedictory air to the work, studded with explicit references to characters like Harry Callahan, Gunny Highway and Josey Wales. Like his other films, Gran Torino has some satisfying shades of moral uncertainty lurking beneath the surface. But viewers will also get a giddy thrill of seeing a 78-year-old badass pulling a gun on gangbangers and snarling, "Get off my lawn." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Milk ★★★ ½ Playing the title role in Gus Van Sant's rousing, surprisingly accessible biography of slain civil-rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years: He smiles. Oscar-season biopics often feel like homework, but Van Sant charts Milk's rise to prominence as the first openly gay man elected to public office as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead, who clearly hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High. Eight years ago, this gifted director turned his back on Hollywood, devoting himself to abstract, lyrical films like Gerry, Last Days, and his recent Paranoid Park. In such difficult company, Milk feels startlingly conventional. It's crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining, yet crafted with savvy visual intelligence by Van Sant and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides. Like the inclusive American ideals Milk so boisterously advocated, the movie is open to everybody. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Quantum of Solace ★★★ If you look at Casino Royale as the James Bond franchise's Batman Begins, this nasty piece of business counts as the series' The Dark Knight, as it sends a dour and vengeful 007 into a chaotic world gone wrong. Daniel Craig once again compellingly plays the legendary secret agent as a perpetual motion machine, brusque and cruel in the manner of Ian Fleming's original novels. The film takes a while to get rolling, as it's front-loaded with too many inconsequential chase sequences that are often poorly staged by director Marc Forster. But Quantum improves considerably once folks are allowed to settle down and start speaking to one another. Paul Haggis' screenplay snarkily reconfigures the past movies' shadowy cabal Spectre as a new millennium group of cutthroat capitalists reservation and start mucking with our expectations. Most recently in The Good German, Soderbergh cast George Clooney and Cate Blanchett in a meticulous recreation of a '40s wartime melodrama, but then encouraged everybody to curse and screw as if in a modern indie. The experiment was a disaster, but an audacious one.

Che is even bolder. Soderbergh's effort is split into two separate movies and takes on the controversial, Marxist revolutionary whom Jean-Paul Sartre once called "the most complete human being of our age." But these days, he's more recognizable as a face on T-shirts.

If it's indeed even possible to make a film about Che Guevara without pissing everybody off, Soderbergh may have done it. His trick is detachment and dispassion, qualities one seldom finds in Hollywood biographies, as they're generally designed to sell the audience on a historical figure's importance and innate goodness. Che's achievement seems particularly stark when looking back on Walter Salles' The Motorcycle Diaries, a 2004 art-house smash that relentlessly sentimentalized Guevara's early years. Gael García Bernal played the young rebel with pleading, puppy eyes, begging you to love him.

Che won't stand for that tripe. The movie seeks not to explain, nor to enlighten but simply to observe. Absent any of the conventions that ingratiate a character to the audience, it exists at a curious remove from its subject. Sometimes it's so detached you'll feel like you're watching it from another room. Other times it's mesmerizing.

> Del Toro is always fascinating because he never seems to care if you're watching.

Benicio Del Toro stars as Guevara, and the film is unthinkable without his performance. He has a naturally riveting screen presence that's enshrouded in privacy. Del Toro is always fascinating because he never seems to care if you're watching. For the vast majority of the mammoth running time, Soderbergh plays hide-and-seek with the actor, obscuring his leading man in the corners of the frame. He's revealed to us only in glimpses and glances, never receiving a conventional close-up until the film's final shot. Like most choices made in Che, this sounds completely insane in theory, but because Del Toro is so compelling, we can't stop scanning the screen and seeking him out.

The first half depicts the overthrow of Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista as a lavish, action-adventure, interlaced with black-and-white recreations of Guevara's incendiary speech before the United Nations General Assembly. It's hardly a hagiographic testament. Soderbergh ignores the material's inherent political trappings and narrowly focuses on the brute process of revolt. The movie is an epic of logistics and grunt work. The most symbolic sequence finds Guevara and his company trapped in an apartment complex, slowly making their way to freedom by knocking down one wall after another. And then another, and then another.

There's no pause for glory, just an intermission. The second half skips a few years ahead to Bolivia and serves as a distorted mirror of the first. Soderbergh constricts the screen size from cinemascope to a boxier aspect ratio, bleaches the colors and replaces the earlier, elegant camerawork with jangly, hand-held movement. It's a long slog through the jungle, where everything that went right for Guevara's rebels in Cuba goes horribly wrong.

As befitting such a doggedly unconventional film, Che has a unique release pattern. In some theaters, it'll be shown in its entirety as one movie with a four-and-a-half hour running time. In others, it'll be split into two features charging separate admissions, just in case you want to see it but don't have a whole day to kill. In retrospect, I wish I had been able to take a bit of a breather between the two volumes. Despite the exceptionally high quality of Soderbergh's filmmaking and the gonzo integrity of the project, it can't help but be a bit of a grind over the long haul. ✖✖✖ bleeding the world's natural resources dry. It's lean and mean to a fault; a bit more breathing room for the supporting cast might have helped matters. Still, the sheer viciousness of the film and bleakness of its worldview are bracing. (Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (In the suburbs.)

Seven Pounds ★ ½ Containing roughly 20 minutes of story stretched out to a full two hours, this exceedingly poor film directed by Gabriele Muccino is nothing but smoke and mirrors. Seven Pounds plays out like an exercise in needless viewer annoyance. Will Smith stars as Ben Thomas, maybe. He might be an IRS agent traveling around the country auditing people who just so happen to be suffering from terminal illnesses. But then again, he might not. There's also much ado about a poisonous jellyfish. Good manners and common decency prohibit me from exposing the character's ultimate purpose, but I can say that it's so insanely, egregiously stupid that when I've tried to spoil the ending for friends, most of them refuse to believe me. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in suburbs.)

Synecdoche, New York ★★ In his startlingly original screenplays for Being John Malkovich, Adaptation and Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, Charlie Kaufman merged depressive angst with absurdist whimsy to create his own genre: heartsick slapstick. His directorial debut, a grammar-nerd goof on my mom's hometown of Schenectady, is similarly ambitious but lacks any levity or momentum. The film is obsessed with the ways art cannibalizes life, the deterioration of the human body and finally the grim inevitability of death. Philip Seymour Hoffman stars as a sickly theater director attempting to make sense of his life by staging it as an ever-evolving theater experience, until he becomes so consumed with recasting and rewriting that he loses all trace of himself. It's a nifty metaphor, one perhaps more suited for a novel, but as a feature, Synecdoche is an unbearable grind that's relentlessly one-note, dingy and oppressive as you wait for everybody to die of old age. The movie is thrilling to discuss afterward, but torture to actually sit through. (In the suburbs.)

Twilight ★ Stephenie Meyer's tween novels reach their insidious cinematic potential in the hands of Catherine Hardwicke, who trivialized adolescent drug use with her insipid Thirteen before shrinking the Virgin Mary's life story into a Dude, Where's My Manger epic in her justly forgotten

Nativity Story. Twilight teaches young girls that a hunky, handsome vampire (Robert Pattinson) will always love you for your clumsy, banal self, no matter how dull you are. The film is a deeply unsettling glimpse into modern American psychosis, equating desire with death and boasting enlightened concepts like, "We can't go all the way, because then you'll turn into a monster." So amateurishly assembled that the villains don't even arrive until the 90-minute mark, this is Hardwicke's most incompetent movie yet, about as lame as you'd expect from a 53-year-old lady lecturing "these kids, today." (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Unborn ★ Call me crazy, but isn't it a bit tacky to use the Holocaust as a plot point in a teeny-bopper thriller? One where the main motivation is to provide underwear shots of comely starlet Odette Yustman? Writer/director David Goyer, best known for penning the latest Batman flicks, has helmed a heck of a confounding mess here. It's like the Jewish version of The Exorcist by way of a Maxim photo shoot. The blank Yustman finds herself haunted by a dybbuk, a possibly demonic twin brother she may have accidentally strangled in utero. How the story begins at Auschwitz is too convoluted and exploitative to be explained in brief, but on the bright side, we get the bizarre sight of Gary Oldman as a mild-mannered rabbi who blows a bedazzled shofar and reacts with spectacular nonchalance when confronted by backwards-headed hellhounds. Honestly, I had no idea what was going on most of the time. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Valkyrie ★★ ½ Tom Cruise is more famous these days for bizarre behavior than blockbusters, so in desperate need of career rehab, he tries to kill Hitler. Cruise stars as Colonel Claus von Stauffenberg, a Nazi with a conscience, whose suitcase bombing nearly took out der Führer in WWII's waning days. It's a handsomely mounted production directed with brisk efficiency by Bryan Singer, and as a pal surmised, "It will probably be wicked suspenseful for anybody who didn't pay attention in history class." Short on characterization and long on Hitchockian set pieces, Valkyrie is leaner than your typical WWII drama. Normally this might be a refreshing change of pace, but absent a compelling point of view, the movie is too focused on the nuts and bolts of an assassination attempt that we already know was a failure. It's hard to get yourself invested. Cruise remains tediously noble, and despite the period trappings, it's not really so different from one of his Mission: Impossible movies. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Wrestler ★★★★ The movie is shrewd enough to use Mickey Rourke's decimated visage to its advantage. Hell, it's practically a monument to his personal ruin. Rourke's washed-up wrestler, Randy "The Ram," is a teetering wreck who doesn't stand a chance of recapturing his former glory, and every close-up hammers that point home. Faced with a health crisis, he makes a few efforts. He reaches out to a sympathetic stripper (well played by Marisa Tomei) who similarly finds herself growing too old for her profession. He briefly attempts to reconnect with his estranged daughter (Evan Rachel Wood), but all the damage he inflicted in the past can't be easily undone. The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions, it simply asks that we spend a little time with these people and live inside their world for a spell. Here, at last, is a true sequel to the original Rocky, full of quiet desperation, squalid backdrops and earthy humor. (At Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

BRIGHT SIDE

Delta Spirit navigates a bumpy road to roots-pop nirvana.

Delta Spirit plays the Middle East Downstairs Feb. 20.

FOR A YOUNG BAND, LIFE ON the road can be a romantic ideal, but one with countless bumps along the way. Just ask Delta Spirit, a San Diego roots-pop quintet that released one of 2008's most spirited and acclaimed CDs, Ode to Sunshine.

After logging 100,000 miles in two vans in less than a year, Delta Spirit can boast a ridiculous streak of bad luck. One van's heater died in the Northeast winter, the other's air conditioning quit down south, then the van broke down altogether in Oklahoma, stranding the group for days.

One band member also spent a night in jail, arrested for carrying alertness drugs he got from his mother. A policeman gave two members $200 tickets for loitering outside a Minneapolis club they had just played. And another got a ticket in Boston after the GPS advised making an illegal turn.

Then there were their computers. One bandmate lost his laptop to the streets of SoHo after he left it on a trailer fender. Three more laptops and a camera disappeared after a van burglary in New Jersey. But that one could have been worse: The group had left the keys on the dashboard.

"Yeah, we're real smart," singer Matt Vasquez says from the group's beachhouse studio, where he was recording new songs on a rare tour break. "The bright side has been the shows. The bright side is that nobody died—yet. Knock on wood.

"All things considered, it's still a really great life," he says, noting the band's two-month fall tour seemed shorter thanks to simpatico headliner Dr. Dog. That Philadelphia group not only parallels Delta Spirit's Beatles-to-Wilco stylistic range, but, he adds, "They're one of the few bands that can just be dudes and watch football."

Indeed, a sense of camaraderie—a communal experience in the face of life's hardships—fuels Delta Spirit's joyful music as well as its road stories. "If you're feeling what I'm feeling, c'mon / All you soul-searching people, c'mon!" he sings, and while many tunes (capped by the title track "Ode to Sunshine") beam with optimism, many also reference the social and economic plights that we face.

"There's just so much to talk about in life, especially right now," says Vasquez, 25, who splits lyrics and music credits with his bandmates. "You can't live your whole life in idealism without confronting yourself. It's no reason to quit trying to change or grow as a person. That's what growing is all about. But at least have a head about it."

One band member spent a night in jail, arrested for carrying alertness drugs he got from his mother.

Of course Vasquez wouldn't be where he is today had drummer Brandon Young not heard him three years ago, loudly busking outside a rail station at 2:30 am. Young suspected the singer would make a good fit with him, bassist Jon Jameson and guitarist Sean Walker, and Vasquez's longtime multi-instrumentalist friend Kelly Winrich sealed the deal.

The group took its name from a company run by Jameson's great-uncle, the Delta Spirit Taxidermy Station of North Central Alabama, and hit the San Diego club circuit. But Vasquez says that residencies and house parties helped. "We've been able to juxtapose ourselves to whatever the crowd's feeling energy-wise," he says. "If they're quieter, we're going to hang on our slow songs and draw them out a bit. And if people are really drunk, we're just going to play our slow songs really loud!"

The band signed with Boston's Rounder label, a delight for the musically omnivorous Vasquez, who filled a pillow case with historical discs from Alan Lomax and Jamaica's Studio One on his last swing through town. "I'm more about the character of the person," he says of his idols, which range from Nirvana to Robert Johnson. "Nick Cave and Tom Waits are far more interesting to me than Justin Timberlake."

Speaking of characters, Delta Spirit picked an unusual subject for its CD cover. On the front, Winrich's great-uncle Thomas Payne, a research scientist, hoists a glass of wine during a 1978 convention on bark beetles. And in another vintage photo on the back, Payne plays Chinese checkers in the bathtub with his wife. "He's an awesome dude," Vasquez says. "His vino consumption is probably a lot less than it used to be in the '60s, but you can't blame him."

When Delta Spirit rolls into the Middle East Feb. 20, it'll be the group's fourth show in town since June, and its third at that club. This time, the guys are headlining the downstairs room where they opened for Dr. Dog, the kind of positive bump they're realizing nationwide on this tour.

"Everybody knows the words to every song instead of just some single," Vasquez says. So it's not just about "People C'mon" or "Trashcan," where Winrich bangs a trashcan lid to the rollicking piano melody. "It gets me going. You can only go as far as people let you, and when they let you, it's so insane, it gives you chills." ✖✖✖

Bench Men

Flowers' Power Brandon Flowers and his bandmates helped bring an '80s post-punk vibe back to rock. That, and skinny ties. Since reaching the top of the charts in 2003, the Killers have shown that sticking to your influences pays off. Despite being glossier and more maturely produced, their newest album Day & Age still reflects a taste for synthesizers and upbeat choruses. Confessed U2 disciples, the Killers bring their stadium status to the Agganis Arena on Jan. 26. Move over, Coldplay.

Liar Liar

Blast From the Past

In Hallie Ephron's thriller Never Tell a Lie, a couple encounters a former classmate on the day she disappears (thus eerily fulfilling her high-school superlative, "Most Likely to Mysteriously Vanish"). Now the husband is a suspect, and his wife must dig into the past to clear his name. Her investigations uncover chilling truths—like acne and braces. Oh, the horror. Ephron appears at Borders Books Back Bay on Jan. 27.

LIGHTS FANTASTIC

Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Suburb....

AOL Living and The Saugus Advertiser, we respectfully beg to differ. And no offense to Mike and Patricia Conlon of Saugus.

For roughly 15 years, a group of my friends and I have loaded into our cars (or the odd limo) and driven up the Lynn Fells Parkway to the neighborhoods north of Boston where the citizenry decorates its lawns for the holidays with a fanatacism Al Qaeda can only dream of. Then we head to Kowloon on Route 1 to get loaded on Suffering Bastards and clog our arteries with pu-pu platters.

It's a holiday tradition we cherish, but this year it seems that the aforementioned self-appointed experts took it upon themselves to anoint the Conlons' home, at 401 Lynn Fells Parkway, as the area's best.

Not to say that it wasn't perfectly over-the-top, with its inflatable figurines and lights that could be seen from outer space. But amidst spareribs and tacky tiki glasses, we argued and debated like Talmudic scholars.

No. 9 Laurine Road, which had come close to inducing seizures in years past, seemed more subdued, but that may have been because two feet of snow obscured a lawn typically alive with grazing reindeer, choo-choos and candy canes. Then there was the house that looked like it was being swallowed by a Chinese dragon, the one clearly done by a guy who's color-blind, and the anal-retentive house, where the lights looked like they had been hung with a ruler, a level and a T-square.

We couldn't reach a consensus, so we turned to the evening's unofficial high rabbi, my dear friend Matthew Rushford, to settle the matter.

An unusually astute and aesthetically precocious seven-year-old who lives in Wellesley (where decorating in any palette other than high WASP is considered déclassé), he concluded that they were all pretty amazing, but the faux-Polynesian decor at the restaurant was even cooler.

Then he ordered himself another Suffering Bastard.

La Plus Ça Change...

Apparently, an insufficient number of Boston girls from good homes wanted to come out this year—at least in the non-lesbian sense—but despite the lack of debutantes in the receiving line, the Winter Ball was as delightful as always.

The coat room at the Winter Ball

Held, par usual, at the Park Plaza Hotel, it had a certain St. Petersburg-before-the-Revolution feel, since several feet of snow had dumped the night before.

Anthropologically speaking, one of the most interesting aspects of the evening was the coat room, where full-length minks were checked alongside Bean boots—the quintessential Brahmin uniform for such occasions. Sociologically speaking, the ball offered a chance to catch up with such patrician partygoers as Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Handasyd Perkins Whitney XVI (or maybe the XVII, but who's counting?), grand old man Michael Robbins and his vivacious offspring Tish, with her husband, upper-crust Brit Andrew McIlwraith, a passel of Treacys, including Evelyn, Michael, Parker and Hunter, the breathtaking Chantal Sterling and her other half, Darryl, the dapper and debonair Teddy Talbot, social stalwarts Bob and Donna Storer, organizer (and department store heiress) Hope Lincoln Baker, Beacon Hill chatelaine Smoki Bacon and her other half, Dick Concannon, and the inimitable Nathan Frank, sans his other half, Polish aristo-funboy Krystian von Speidel, who was busy having dinner at the White House that evening (well, lah-dee-dah!).

Guests whirled around the dance floor, hoisted a few frosty ones, and caught up with old prep-school chums and fellow Ivy League alums. Demonstrating how much things have changed, Molly Storer used Facebook to get 143 hot young things to attend the ball. And demonstrating that the more things change, the more they stay the same, one young blueblood was overheard at the bar saying, "Man, she's hot... but I'm pretty sure we're related."

The first reader to guess her identity will receive an Improper Bostonian T-shirt, chic enough to wear on any occasion, including weddings, funerals and bar mitzvahs. Bonus points—and an Improper coffee mug—go to the first person who also knows the name of the Italian designer who did her dress. (Hint: she's married to a guy named Ralph.) ✖✖✖

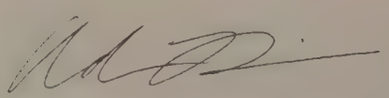
To Make Much of Time



Long ago, before I entered the state of holy, two-kids-and-a-mortgage matrimony, I was, to use the technical term, a bachelor/ette. It's hard to remember the details now, but I have a hazy recollection of life being a lot like a beer commercial. Not one of the fun ones with oiled swimsuit models, of course. It's just that my apartment always looked like it had been soiled by a team of drunk Clydesdales.

Maybe that's the reason I never made The Improper's annual list of desirable singles, which this year includes our first-ever sousaphone player (finally!). These people are practically oozing with romantic possibility, bringing to mind Robert Herrick's advice, "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may." Because before you know it, you'll be spending your nights forking out pot roast to a growing brood of house apes.

To single guy Nick Altschuller, time well-spent means staring down the business end of a beer bottle and lobbing bean bags at a hole. In his column, he reveals that this isn't a pastime for shrieking cretins, but is actually the national sport of Kentucky. Meanwhile, Amanda Knorr discovers homemade makeup tricks in time for recession-era Valentine's dates.

A parting thought on rosebuds: Gathering them is probably brutal on the fingertips. Better to avoid the thorns and pay a visit to a qualified florist (see page 9).

Flower Play

PETAL PUSHER

Some vocations are in the blood. "My family is from Holland originally," says Andrea Halliday, owner of Table and Tulip, a floral-design business based out of the Portobello Road boutique in Newton. "So I've always been inspired by tulips. And dirt."

Halliday, 29, sees her work as the application of modern art to flowers. Or maybe it's more the creation of visual dessert. "An arrangement's not done until you want to eat it!" she laughs. "Until it's really juicy and lush and has that quality that's totally sexy."

A native of Medfield, Halliday managed a Newbury Street flower shop before moving to Venice, Calif., a few years ago. Friends lured her back East on account of her unusual knack with blooms. "I turn roses inside out, so they're reflexed. It makes them appear almost like gardenias." She also has a taste for peppering her flowers with small oranges or cherries. Personally, though, she keeps hyacinths by her bed. "It's nice to wake up to a sweet smell."

Inventing tasteful bouquets makes Halliday hard to impress. Instead, she welcomes an ironic approach. "The other extreme, like the most god-awful bunch of rainbow-colored flowers with glittery sticks. I think they're funny." Even better, she tells budding Romeos to toss the wrapping and show up with a large, single flower looking fresh from the garden. "A single, blown-open peony. Or lush dahlia."

ANDREW RIMAS

Drink of the Moment

Do the Deux

Hungry Mother's drink list reads like a math sequence: No. 2, No. 13, No. 26 . . .

The origin is co-owner Alon Munzer's brainstorm in the days before the restaurant's opening last year. A small catalog of cocktails resulted, some combinations Munzer had never even tried before, but a healthy libation foundation was laid. "Honestly, I don't know where the ideas came from," he tries to recall. "I think if you're overeducated on something, and you try to create your own, it's always a take on something else. Whereas if you don't know as much, it's more of an original creation, at least in your mind. It's not like I set out to make a version of the Manhattan, it just turned out that way."

The No. 2 ($9) is a countrified version, foregoing sweet vermouth for sorghum syrup and the cherry for boiled peanuts. A splash of Amaretto accents the nuttiness, and combined with the sweetness of the bourbon and treacly mouthfeel of the syrup, the No. 2 is a great morning cocktail, if you're into that. At least it would go great with waffles.

The drink is also a hit with the evening crowds, as the No. 2 and the No. 13 (Scotch, tawny port and sour) are the only integers to continually survive the regular revisions, where cocktails are chopped, others are added, and the list expands on into infinity. But since the beginning, No. 2 has been there. You gotta start somewhere.

NICK ALTSCHULLER

Good Eats

Mousse Morals

A Joanne Chang restaurant with no dessert? That couldn't last long. Boston's queen of tarts, cakes and ooey-gooey sticky buns had long teased sweets-seekers at her swank Asian diner: Every order of tea-smoked ribs and sambal-sauced oyster omelets was followed by a gratis shot of decadent lemon-ginger mousse. It was punchy, impossibly silky and showered with candied ginger. We didn't dare ask how much heavy cream she added—we just wanted to know how to get more. Look no further than the recently added dessert menu. And as an extra bonus, the glass comes garnished with a house-made fortune cookie. ELIZABETH BOMZE

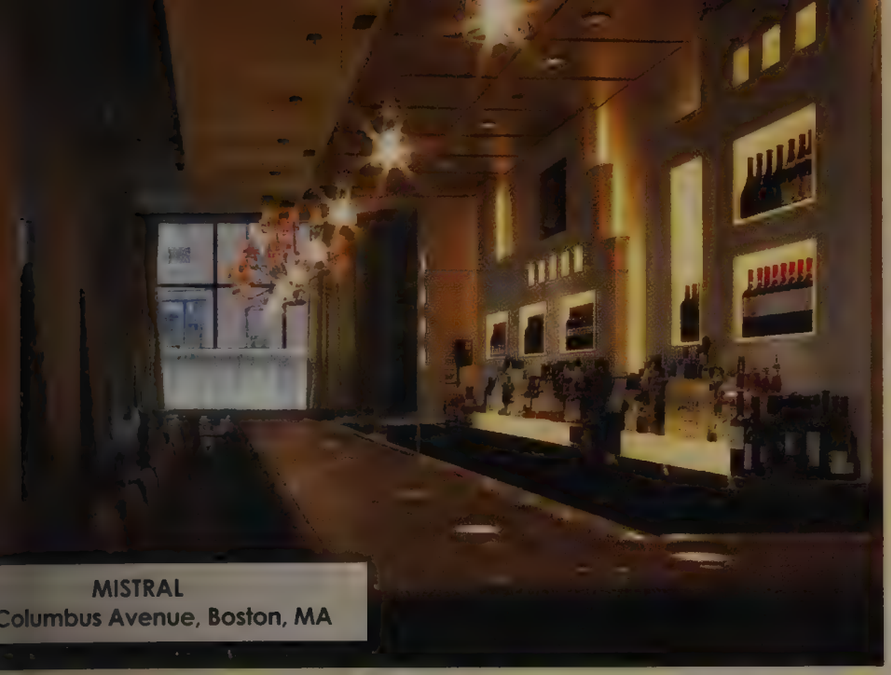
ASK THE EXPERT



Q:

WHAT CHOCOLATE DO YOU RECOMMEND FOR SOMEONE, BASED ON HIS OR HER PERSONALITY?

HEATHER FRITZ CHOCOLATIER AT AROA FINE CHOCOLATE, 1651 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON (617-425-4988)

Picking out a box of chocolates for your valentine can be a daunting task, especially if you aren't sure what he or she likes. Taking clues from his or her personality is usually a good place to start. If your date is adventurous, try a box filled with exotic flavors like basil or ginger. Maybe your date is calm and likes more familiar flavors such as raspberry and a rich Mexican vanilla. For a relaxing night in, choose something special, like a port-wine chocolate and a milk-chocolate hazelnut. Or for that special night of romance, a champagne truffle and dark-chocolate mint are perfect to share. To really heat things up, give a box of passion fruit– or chili pepper–filled chocolates. As always, along with the tried and true familiar flavors, I suggest throwing something unexpected in the mix. KYLE WRIGHT

COLUMBUS RESTAURANT GROUP

Is It Chile in Here?

A funny thing happened on the way to the recession: "Value" stopped being a dirty word. Suddenly, bargains are hot. In the stodgy wine world, this translates to another newly fashionable five-letter word: "Chile." One welcome change is an emerging generation of wine drinkers who prefer flavor and style over pedigree. Chile delivers in spades, especially when it comes to red varieties. If you enjoy intense, dark-berry notes in your wine but don't want to spend more than 15 bucks, look no further. Having recently visited Santiago and judged over 500 wines blind in one week, I can report that the following winners won't disappoint.

Palo Alto Reserve, Maule Valley, 2006 ($14, the Wine Press, Brookline). While Palo Alto's not the official wine of Stanford University, drinking it might make you feel smarter. This major-league reserve-level blend of cabernet sauvignon, carmenère and syrah tastes twice as good as it needs to for the price. From grapes grown deep in the cool, southern Maule Valley, Palo Alto's highly expressive raspberry, chocolate and mint-leaf aromas are balanced with tart but fruity cherry and spice flavors. Dress it up with a sizzling steak, or down with a juicy burger.

Cono Sur Cabernet Sauvignon/ Carmenère, Colchagua Valley, 2007 ($10, the Wine and Cheese Cask, Somerville) This is a producer with a young team dedicated to organic and biodynamic production. Rather than spraying pesticides, Cono Sur keeps a flock of geese in the vineyards to gobble up all the insects that prey on ripening grapes in the spring. Although all the wines are thrilling for the price, this blend especially stands out. Black-purple in color with a floral, slightly herbal bouquet, its luscious, creamy texture and slightly peppery dark-plum, coffee-like flavors balance one another beautifully.

Santa Rita Cabernet Sauvignon Reserva, Maipo Valley, 2006 ($12, the Wine Emporium, Boston) Nothing comes close to Chilean cabernet in the "I can't believe it only costs..." category. Santa Rita's estate-bottled Reserva always overdelivers succulent black-currant fruit and soft tannins for the money. Hailing from Chile's top cabernet zone, it's full-bodied but extra juicy. This vintage has a fine clove-like dark-spice edge that complements savory dishes like grilled sausages or roast pork.

Master of Wine Sandy Block is vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods.

OPEN HOUSE

"This opening hallway is the same, but everything else was torn down to the studs," says hard-hatted Howie Turkenkopf, marketing manager for the new House of Blues. Set up on Lansdowne Street in the space formerly occupied by Avalon, Axis and the Modern, it's an enormous 53,000-square-foot venue. Walking into the music hall recalls those first steps into the light at a ballpark, a feeling aided by the live birds fluttering around the site. (The club will open Feb. 20, but there's still some construction left.)

On the slate is a mix of names—from BB King and Buddy Guy, to dance and pop acts like Thievery Corporation and Katy Perry. It's a departure from the club's early years in Harvard Square, but the competition now is the Palladium, not the Cantab Lounge. "We go after a diverse group of bands, so you'll see everything from Gwar to Tom Jones," explains talent buyer John Innamorato. Adds partner Ryan Vangel, "It was much smaller before, so could have a blues-dominant schedule. Here, you have to a have variety because of the capacity. And the blues scene isn't as strong as it used to be."

Yes, it's doubtful that there are 2,400 blues fans that could consistently fill the hall's main floor, two decks and seven bars on a consistent basis. As the largest H.O.B., it's a bit of a maze, and on a tour through rooms, offices and restaurants, even the employees get a little discombobulated. "The House of Blues has an intentional Alice in Wonderland feel that's kind of confusing," concedes installation lead Ivan Wetzel. While hanging Gujarat fabric in the prayer room, the aspiring yoga instructor details the aesthetic to the Foundation Room, a VIP area featuring a media room, lounge, private areas and a restaurant offering a separate menu from the company's usual Southern-themed fare served below. Underscoring the Indian-palace theme are carpets, a giant lotus and the multicultural accents that mark the brand's goal to bring people together through music. "The spirit of the House of Blues, you can feel it move in as everything [comes] together. Being a part of this is a real privilege."

SECRET SERVICES

From toothpaste treating blemishes to hemorrhoid cream counteracting puffiness, we thought we'd heard it all. But four Boston makeup artists prove that when it comes to a flawless face, there's no regimen too strange and no substance too off limits. Below are their most covert cosmetic tricks.

AMANDA KNORR

Gretchen Mauras
at Beaucage

"With eyeliner, a lot of people have problems with coal pencils. If you freeze the pencil for 15 minutes, it's just easier to use and there's no skipping, crumbling or smudging. It doesn't go on as soft."

Brian Brady
at G20 Spa and Salon

"The skin should look its best [before applying makeup], so I've done oatmeal and egg whites on the face and wiped it off, before I do the skin. Botox-free, egg whites tighten your skin. Leave it on for 10–15 minutes, and then do your moisturizer. When you apply your foundation it looks firmer and smoother."

Andrea Ducharme
at Rouge Cosmetics

"Rub a paste of salt and Aquaphor on your lips to make them swell up a bit. This naturally exfoliates as well. [And] take cold showers. The cool water gives your complexion a glow and makes hair shinier—it smooths the cuticle."

Robin Powers
at Emerge

"Heat up your lash curler with a hairdryer before you use it. It helps maintain the curl a little bit longer. And don't use the blow dryer on your eyes when using the lash curler! [Also,] use green-tea bags. Cool them and put them on your skin if you have any puffiness or irritation, because green tea has antioxidants to help soothe irritated skin."

TWISTS AND TURNS

A maternal mystery and mystical movements

Pants on Fire

PREGNANCY ITSELF presents a story of suspense, full of burgeoning excitement and twinges of fear. In Hallie Ephron's new book, Ivy and David—expecting their first baby—hold a yard sale that attracts another pregnant woman who turns out to be Mindy, a former school acquaintance. Back then, she'd been awkward, rejected, cruelly termed "friendliest" in the yearbook. Now she seems sophisticated and ominously curious about the couple's house where she'd played as a child. She invites herself in. And then, somehow fails to emerge. A bloody shirt subsequently appears in the sidewalk reject box. David becomes a suspect, and their charged-up lawyer friend, Theo, takes the case. Mindy emerges as crazy-jealous, wounded by unrequited love for David dragged across the years. Racing the birth clock, Ivy stalks back her stalker in thrillingly terrifying scenes. With her irreverent friend, Jody, as her only ballast and comfort, Ivy confronts the possibility that her husband's high-school actions, ambiguous yet questionable, are the dark tendrils that have led to Mindy's wildly twisted obsessions. Ephron asks: Do we ever really know our loved ones?
Never Tell a Lie by Hallie Ephron, who lives near Boston, is a novel of suspense.

FLIP SERVICE AIKIDO IN ACTION

Martial Plan

HOLDING A STANCE of majestic calm, aikido master William Gleason Sensei stands like a tree delivering slight, willowy movement. This non-conflict martial art pairs attacker with thrower. Dressed in exotic robes, one person approaches Gleason Sensei, who responds in an elegantly minimal, arm-curling way, throwing the attacker around in a swirling choreography. Their mysteriously cooperative dance eventually lands him on the ground, and he slaps the mat loudly, bracing his fall. The studio's padded white flooring fills the entire space, which dramatizes the experience. Skillfully "receiving" the energy, Gleason, with nearly 40 years of experience (including 10 in Japan), talks to the class between exercises. He twines themes of balance, harmony, timing and connection with parallel philosophical ideas. By the end, the room is hushed and dark, lit by strands of twinkly colored lights. Soothing Jenn Pici teaches "Restorative Slow Flow Vinyasa Yoga," a rolling sequence that follows your breath in and out of each pose. Pici comfortingly encourages students to, "Find [their] own sense in the rhythm of the earth."
Shobu Aikido (34 Allen St., Somerville, 617-718-1918, shobu.org) also offers yoga and aikido for kids.

KERNEL KNOWLEDGE

Drinking where the sun don't shine.

AS SOMEONE approximating an adult, I've learned that drinking isn't for games. Drinking is for dulling the miserable ache of a monotonous, workaday reality. Alcohol is a depressant, and it takes a learned man to embrace that.

In college, our game was Beirut. For the uninitiated, Beirut involves caking dirt and germs onto a ping-pong ball, then throwing it in a cup of beer to create a fetid bacteria culture your opponent must drink. It's fun, but something I gladly left behind at graduation.

I first saw Cornhole a few years ago when I was living in Missouri. You play by throwing beanbags at two small ramps, with one point for landing on the ramp and three for sinking a bag in the cornhole. The difference is tallied and awarded to whichever team scores more. Game to 21. House rules vary, but getting cornholed is usually an occasion to drink. It's Beirut for hicks, and I used it to validate my Yankee arrogance. Our game is a subtle allegory for Middle Eastern conflict; theirs is a blatant sodomy reference.

But Cornhole is spreading. In fact, the American Cornhole Association (really) claims its membership grew to over 25,000 last year, so the goal of its "founding memeber" to "make Cornhole, America's game" now seems less ridiculous, if no less grammatically hilarious. Maybe you shouldn't play before writing your mission statement, man.

Cornhole is huge wherever they love college football. It's a great tailgating activity. But this is Boston. I know more Republicans than I do college football fans. How successful could a league here be? Well, the Social Boston Sports league filled up within days, with over 70 teams and an extensive waiting list. I only snuck in by agreeing to split one team between four people. Apparently, if there's beer, Bostonians will come. So with Cornhole officially on our turf, my friend John and I set out to defend our regional honor in a best two-out-of-three match.

"This is my first game. Have you played a lot?" I asked, introducing myself to our opponents.

"We're from Tennessee," one twanged. "We played every weekend."

There's nothing like getting your ass kicked to build enthusiasm for a new sport. On his first turn, the guy on my side sank three bags and turned to me with a look I read as, "Hey, what can ya do? I'm a dick." They built a commanding lead, and my frustration mounted as keeping score required both math and paying attention, two things I suck at even while sober. So I was never quite sure if they were cheating.

Then, as the beer kicked in, I caught fire. I'm not exaggerating when I say I'm undoubtedly the best Cornhole rookie who has ever lived, ever. I put on a clinic, and soon enough it was 21-19, good over evil.

Leading 19-10 in Game 2, I watched all the color drain from the Tennesseans' faces. I could feel their anger, and I thought to myself, nothing beats pissing off a Southerner. I may have even written it down. I knew it was a curse, but I was drunk with power, and also beer. Besides, we only needed two points.

Of course we lost. My fire sputtered out and John started throwing like a rusty tin man. Despite a valiant comeback in Game 3, we went down 19-21, and the Confederacy won.

Convening at the bar, a friend observed, "You know Johnny was throwing with his right hand."

"Yeah, so?"

"He's a lefty."

"Johnny, what the hell is this, The Princess Bride?"

Seems that my partner chipped his elbow after a drunken spill and was forced to use his off-hand and the elbow he broke last year while drunk. I was bitter, but at least I had someone to blame, which, as consolation prizes go, ain't so bad.

With my return to drinking games, I'm a little surprised at how badly I want to win. I know now is a time to put away childish things, but for the next two months, I'm as focused as six pints will allow me to be. After that, I can go back to drinking like a man—alone, in the dark, softly crying myself to sleep. ✖✖✖

BANK ON IT

Of doom and bondage

REMEMBER WHEN THE formal architecture and opulent fittings of a prestigious bank represented the comfortable security of wealth and its attendant promise of a lifestyle that included fine dining? Exquisitely set into the old Member's Court at the former Federal Reserve Bank building–turned–Langham Hotel, Bond is sure to elicit those memories. High-vaulted ceilings, marble, crystal chandeliers, an elegantly curved rosewood bar—is this any kind of destination for today's disaster-minded diners? Well, yes, actually. Because executive chef Mark Sapienza's menu features "small plates" that range in price from eight to 18 dollars, so you don't have to break the bank (sorry) to enjoy an evening—or lunch, or afternoon tea—in a sophisticated setting.

ICARUS UP IN THE AIR: Among a growing roster of restaurants for sale is one South End landmark venue. When chef/owner Chris Douglass came aboard his upscale neighborhood eatery more than 30 years ago, Icarus marked the start of a new era in Boston dining. Today, with the recent launch of two decidedly more casual spots in his home neighborhood of Dorchester—Ashmont Grill and Tavolo—Douglass still has his finger on the pulse of current trends and may recast Icarus in a newer, economically-updated mold.

KEEPING TABS: After a pause in activity, construction has resumed at the forthcoming Stoddard's Fine Food and Ale in the Ladder District.... Those Middlesex Lounge guys are known for being laid-back, but there's still no word as to when their latest project, Tory Row, will finally open in the Greenhouse space in Harvard Square.... Apparently, the former B-Side Lounge has at last been sold and will reopen.... Watch for details on the new proprietors in next issue's column.

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH JAMIE BISSONNETTE }

HOG HEAVEN

Craigie on Main nails nose-to-tail cooking.

SWINE DINING Murray and Bissonnette settle in for a long night.

"I WANT TO FREEBASE PIGS' FEET," chef Jamie Bissonnette proclaimed, face glistening with pork fat. He sat before a half-eaten, stuffed pig's trotter at Craigie on Main, and if he hadn't said it aloud, his grin would have summed it up. This is exactly the effect chef/owner Tony Maws' cooking can have on a pork-lover. By using all parts of the animal—the feet and ankles in this case—he manages to elevate the other white meat to intoxicating levels of deliciousness. Bissonnette, the chef at Toro (and KO Prime before that), and Maws are two of the city's finest offal and charcuterie chefs, which is why I wanted to bring Bissonnette to the new location of Maws' beloved Craigie St. Bistro. The two have never cooked together but have similar pedigrees, having both worked at Clio.

Grilled octopus

As Bissonnette and I sat at a tall table facing the kitchen, Maws came by to say hello. He and his family had recently had a fantastic meal at Toro, and he was anxious to return the favor. We hardly needed the menu; Bissonnette was set on the chef's tasting, a 10-course experience ($115) that Maws would create on the spot (there's also a six-course option, $80). A couple cocktails later—the Florentine Flip for me ($10) and a Vergano's Bronx for him ($10)—we were presented with the first plate, featuring squid noodles with golden beets and a sardine drizzled with a Banyuls vinegar reduction. The seafood continued with a monkfish-liver pâté covered in a smoky salmon roe. Bissonnette leaned in to whisper, "I have to say, I usually hate monkfish liver." He took a hesitant bite and nodded, as if reassuring himself, and then polished off the rest. "What's the verdict?" I asked.

"It's got great texture; I love the smokiness of the roe, and it's got great salt," he concluded.

Between bites, I managed to pull some personal history out of him. ("I thought we were here to talk about Tony's food," he said shyly.) At 18, Bissonnette moved from Connecticut to Florida for culinary school. The curriculum was slightly over his head. With ambitions to be a professional fighter, he was straight-edge and, for the most part, vegan. His kitchen career eventually took him to Paris, where he worked at Alain Passard's mainly vegetarian restaurant, L'Arpège. Ironically, that's where Bissonnette started eating meat. "The chef noticed I wouldn't taste the food, so one day he pulled me aside and said, 'If you want to be a chef, you need to eat meat,'" Bissonnette explained. "I think I ate a piece of pork, like, immediately."

We dug into our next dish, a perfectly cooked loup de mer (sea bass) filet under crispy skin with ginger and ham salad, a briny green olive puree and a peppery dash of a condiment called yuzu kosho. This was followed by grilled octopus with chunks of hearts of palm and an orange-chorizo sauce. "I can't cook octopus like this. He is so, so good at it," Bissonnette said, a little awestruck. When Maws came over to check in, we tried to pry away his secret, but he wouldn't cave. Finally a deal was struck: the octopus recipe for one of Bissonnette's salami formulas.

Farm-fresh egg and farro risotto

Pied de cochon

We moved into heartier dishes like a slow-cooked, farm-fresh egg served over farro risotto and a slice of boudin noir, flecked with Tennessee truffles. As Maws dug deeper into his whole-animal repertoire, out came two plates of roasted bone marrow with a shitake mushroom ragôut, smoked beef-tongue confit and a foie gras puree, which we happily spread on toast points. Then came the showstopper entree: the pig's trotter or pied de cochon, stuffed with pork sausage. We dug in with our fingers, sucking out the gelatin between each tiny bone.

Despite our heroic efforts, we left some pig on the plate. That left room for the desserts—two tea-scented panna cottas and the richly layered, chocolate mille-feuille. After a shot of cardamom-scented Valrhona hot chocolate, we migrated to the bar and found a few of Bissonnette's chef buddies moaning over massive, cheese-drenched burgers. We looked at one another, eyed the burgers, and quickly placed an order for the happiest ending to a meal either of us could have imagined. ×××

WINE AND DINE

The 20th annual Boston Wine Festival opened at the Boston Harbor Hotel on Jan. 10 with a party attended by 300 people. The event launched a series of wine tastings and dinners that run at the hotel through April 3. The opening party featured a buffet and samples from 50 of this year's featured wineries.

On Jan. 24, the Four Seasons Hotel held a star-studded "Celebrity Casino Night" to benefit Journey Forward, a nonprofit organization to better the lives of those with spinal-cord injuries. The event featured gambling, auctions, a dessert reception and a raffle. Some 350 partygoers attended and raised more than $150,000.

DEGREES OF DIFFICULTY

Thinking about getting an MBA? You and everybody else.

IT SEEMS THAT I ALONE among my peers lack a secondary degree. I've considered going back to school for a master's in journalism, because I still don't know what editors are talking about when they throw around jargon-y phrases like, "You're burying the lede," or "Your column is going to get us sued for libel." And I have a source whom I just made up who tells me that you're taught important journalistic ethics in a master's program. Apparently, you also learn valuable writing rules—like, you get fired for using more than one exclamation point in your entire career! That's incredible!

Clearly, I have no use for an M of J, as it's possibly called. But my friends seem to have all gone to grad school of some sort. I know five lawyers, three doctors, one social worker and about 300 MBAs. And herein, I think, lies one of the causes of the current economic mess. MBA programs simply seem too good to be true. So, you're telling me that I can get a two-year degree, and then I'm qualified to make loads of money? Where do I sign up? Because that sounds a lot better than being a doctor or lawyer or even a journalist.

One of my buddies got his MBA degree in the Midwest, but every time I talked to him he was snorkeling in St. Croix or playing the Robert Trent Jones Golf Trail in Alabama. I'd say, "Wow, that's pretty cool that you can fit that in while you're in school," and he'd reply, "Well, this is a school thing." Apparently part of the MBA curriculum is to learn where to vacation when you're rich. As opposed to medicine, where the daily report from my med-school friends was usually something like, "Today I had to deliver a crack baby from an obese woman with a yeast infection."

There's also the matter of standards. In law you must pass the bar. Medicine has boards. What's the standard for proving that you're a competent businessperson? Dow Kim was one of the main guys who plowed Merrill Lynch deep into the subprime mortgage business, eventually causing the company to lose more money than it had earned in the previous 20 years. Clearly nothing in his Wharton MBA curriculum warned against doing that. But even if it had, he still got a $14.5 million cash bonus in 2006, along with another $20.5 million in stock. Honestly, if you gave me $35 million right now, I would happily drive any company off a cliff. You definitely wouldn't have to pay me the $160 million that Merrill CEO E. Stanley O'Neal (Harvard MBA) was given as a severance package. I'll screw up and go away for much less.

If you gave me $35 million, I would happily drive any company off a cliff.

Of the few people I know who started their own companies, an MBA was certainly not a prerequisite. Granted, I'm not sure there's even a business program to teach you about selling hair extensions—the venture run by my buddy Krishan. If there were, there would be fewer quality weaves in this world, because instead of starting his company, Krishan would've been occupied for two years learning phrases like, "We've got to shift paradigms and get some face-time to monetize the view from 30,000 feet," and taking class trips to Pebble Beach.

My friend John runs a pickled snack-food business, and he has an MBA. I just Googled his company and found a newspaper article that quoted him saying, "Pigs' feet is a static market, but sausage and eggs year over year have been a growth area." If I'm not mistaken, I think that's an MBA way of saying that sausages and eggs are delicious, but pigs' feet are gross. From this I can conclude that John went to business school not for his business, which seems pretty obvious—pickle things that taste good in the first place—but to make connections. Thanks to his MBA pals, John probably could hook you up with a sponsorship at that haughty country club or a coveted investment advisor. Meanwhile, I don't have an MBA, and all my connections can get me are discounts on weaves and pigs' knuckles.

So I'm jealous, sure. But I'm not bummed out about the role that the masters of the business universe played in torpedoing the economy. Thanks to all the mediocre MBAs, there might be new possibilities for people like me. Because I can safely say that I have never lost billions of dollars for any company, and, in fact, have made literally thousands for my writing venture, Ezra-riffic Productions. Therefore, I think I'm qualified to engineer a turnaround at, say, Citigroup. In this economy, you've got to have plans for a backup career, and I'd like to attain a position where you're rewarded for incompetence. Like CEO or coach of the Detroit Lions. Plus, I'm all out of exclamation points. ✖✖✖

A RICE IS WRONGED NO MORE

A Red Sox legend finally finds the Promised Land.

I always believed that Jim Rice was a Hall of Famer. Growing up a Red Sox fan, I was fascinated by Rice. Not only because he was one of the few people of color playing for the hometown team, but he was also one of the most feared hitters of his time. When Rice was up, I was watching.

Before Big Papi was knocking homers out of Fenway, it was Rice who put the fear of God in opposing pitchers. He was an eight-time All-Star. He had four seasons of more than 200 hits and led the American League in home runs three times, RBIs twice, once in hits, twice in slugging percentage. He was MVP in 1978. To cap it off, he retired with a .298 career batting average, 382 home runs, 2,452 hits and 1,451 RBIs.

In my mind, there was no question: Of course Jim Rice was a Hall of Famer!

So why, then, 15 years after he first became eligible, was Rice crossing his fingers, literally on his knees praying (he would never admit this if it weren't true) for acceptance into the Promised Land?

The answer is, sadly, obvious.

I'm too young to have covered Rice during his playing days, so I can't comment firsthand on his "chilly" relationship with the media, but will admit that the first several times I met him after his career was over, he wasn't exactly Mr. Congeniality.

But over the years, I've gotten to know him—thanks to our mutual love for Giblees Men's Clothing Store. I've always considered clothing a passion, but Rice puts me to shame.

Through our time together, I've acquired a healthy respect for Rice, and a better understanding of how his reputation went bad. When it comes down to it, the old scribes, the ones who covered and hated Big Jim, simply didn't understand the guy.

The Sox signed him at the age of 21, fresh out of Anderson, S.C., a very tough part of the country for blacks. Being transplanted to Boston wasn't much easier, since this city, at the time, was an even tougher place for people of color. Even Ray Charles could've seen the chasm between Rice and the white guys who wrote about him.

That he was being punished for those off-the-field issues was inexcusable. But that was his reality.

I talked to Rice on the eve of this year's announcement, and even though his numbers should have sealed the deal, he figured it was a flip of the coin. That's crazy.

He was 24 hours away from getting the phone call and was taking nothing for granted. He wouldn't even admit to being nervous. In fact, earlier in the month he'd talked about playing golf on the big day. But I knew better.

At 1:17 pm on Monday, Jan. 12, Rice answered his phone. He hung up with tears in his eyes. The 600-pound gorilla had exited the room.

Here's what he had to say:

"In a way it bothered me, but it's one of those things you can't control. When you talk about it, you would need to go back and talk to all the writers who voted and ask them why or why not this year. I'm not going to do that or look at the writers in that way. The only thing I know is that I got the call from the commissioner, instead of a call from the Red Sox saying they are sorry."

Rice refused to be bitter on this sweet day. That impressed me the most.

He's finally fulfilled a dream. He's officially part of the Leftfield Legacy—being one of three Red Sox leftfielders whose busts are in Cooperstown, N.Y.

Finally, the baseball writers got it right. ×××

TAKE 5

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON BORAS, BRADY, EDDIE AND THE BIG SCHIL

FIVE MAKING HEADLINES

Jonathan Papelbon... We're ecstatic that Cinco Ocho and the Sox avoided arbitration, but there's something about this relationship that just screams ugly divorce. At some point, management needs to step up to the plate with a long-term offer, and when they do, it's going to get messy. Theo might even have to consider throwing on Youk's elbow guard.

Tom Brady... Whaddaya know? Brady's back on track! Stay tuned for endless and infuriating twists and turns before the season starts. And here's hoping Gisele brought out the sanitizer before hand-feeding Tom down in Mexico. Nothing sabotages rehab worse than Montezuma's revenge.

Scott Boras... You know the worst thing about agents? Agents always want credit for some sh*# they're supposed to do. An agent will brag about some sh*# that a normal agent just does! He'll say something like, "Don't worry, Manny Ramirez will be signed by Spring Training..." Oh really? He's supposed to be, you dumb mother*#%!

Phil Kessel... If there's one local athlete who's earned the title of Comeback Kid, it's Jon Lester. But Kessel makes a great sidekick. Over the last three seasons, the B's young gun has overcome his own bout with cancer, a much-publicized benching in the playoffs and, most recently, mono. Kessel's the Bruins' answer to Detective Nordberg.

Nick Caserio... With the draft right around the corner, Scott Pioli's replacement will quickly be put to the test. Sure, Pioli had his share of April blunders—Bethel Johnson over Anquan Boldin?—but he'd earned the right to periodically screw the pooch.

4 DATES TO WATCH

2/4 The Bruins visit the Flyers, and for the first time since his devastating injury, Patrice Bergeron skates against attacker Randy Jones. It'll be interesting to hear what Jones has to say for himself after the game. That is, once the trainers extricate Chara's fist from his jaw.

2/5 With the Lakers in town, how might green-obsessed Sasha Vujacic react if all of Celtics Nation arrives sporting his "favorite" color? Probably by standing outside the three-point line, not playing any D and looking like an unbelievable douche bag.

2/8 For the 29th and final time, Hawaii's Aloha Stadium plays host to the NFL Pro Bowl. And for the 29th time (and counting), not a single football fan will care.

2/14 The stars are out in Phoenix for the NBA's annual All-Star Saturday. Because nothing says Happy Valentine's Day like, "Hey baby, wanna watch the dunk contest?"

2 EXCERPTS FROM JOE TORRE'S NEW BOOK

July 1998: "I walked into the clubhouse and couldn't believe my eyes. I'd heard the rumors but never imagined one of my own players would put such a despicable substance into his body. Panic-stricken, I called Brian Cashman to break the news: Hideki Irabu had eaten one of the bat boys."

October 2003: "I already booked my tee time for the next morning. We were toast. It'd be Timlin in the eighth, Williamson in the ninth and good night Yankees. But then that magnificent bastard left Pedro in the game! I turned to Don Zimmer, 'Donny, do you believe this?!' Unfortunately, Zim had been fast asleep since the third inning."

3 Celtic Musings

He's so hot right now... Eddie "Hansel" House is the definition of a streaky shooter, but when he's on—see the last half of January—there's no more electrifying player on the court. And while his follow-through is nice, you've got to love House's release. It's quicker than a 16-year-old dude on prom night. (Rim shot!)

The Mentalists... If alley-ooping is cool, then Rondo-to-Garnett is Miles Davis. Their hook-ups have become the signature moves of the 2009 season, and the highlights of any Celtics victory. But what makes this especially awesome is how secretive the pair is about their mental connection. You'd have a better chance of getting Tyler Durden to talk about Fight Club.

Missing: 6'8", 240-pound power forward... Answers to Leon and was last seen in late-December, somewhere between Oakland and Sacramento. He's likely relocated to a part of the country where boxing out is an acceptable form of communication.

ONE PLUG FOR CURT IN THE CAR

We couldn't be happier with Curt Schilling's new gig on WEEI's The Big Show, but if you think Curt's bringing the goods now, just wait until the season starts. In terms of pissing off former teammates, Schil will make Tiki Barber look like Ronde. OK, bad example.

Soroff On DAVID CHOKACHI

The former Baywatch star speaks about fame in South America, his porn name and Richard Simmons.

TV HEARTTHROB DAVID CHOKACHI, who appears on VH1's reality show Confessions of a Teen Idol, is best known for playing Cody Madison on Baywatch. He was born and raised in Plymouth, where his father was chief of surgery at Jordan Hospital, and he attended Bates College, where he was a member of the lacrosse and football teams. He worked on Capitol Hill as a legislative aide before becoming a model and breaking into acting. Chokachi's role on David Hasselhoff's TV juggernaut earned him a spot on People Magazine's 50 Most Beautiful People list. He acted in feature films like Psycho Beach Party, The Dreamless and Bats 2, and starred in the TNT series Witchblade. Chokachi serves on the board of Best Friends Animal Sanctuary and is actively involved with the Waterkeeper Alliance, Surfrider Foundation and Vital Ground. He lives in Los Angeles with his wife, Susan, and their dog, Cami.

Jonathan Soroff: On Confessions of a Teen Idol, who aged the best?
David Chokachi: Let's go with myself.

You lived with six other guys on this show. Who's the biggest slob?
Again, I'll have to go with myself.

One thing I'd be amazed to learn about Scott Baio?
Hmmm. Is he going to read this? Let's put it this way: Scott should have been one of the cast members, not the executive producer. You can leave the rest of that to your imagination.

So does Joanie really love Chachi?
I think Joanie's really pissed at Chachi.

How did it affect your marriage, living with a bunch of guys away from your wife?
They wanted her to be a part of it, for her and I to have some kissing scenes in the sunset. She was like, "Hell, no. Do not mention my name on that show." She kept the whole thing at arm's length.

Do you miss Baywatch?
I do. It was a great gig for me. I love the beach and the ocean. Those were good times. Going to the beach was a day at the office.

Is David Hasselhoff your spiritual father?
Definitely. [Laughs.]

Pamela Anderson or Heather Locklear?
Hands down, Pam.

Any regrets about Baywatch?
There was obviously quite a bit of typecasting after it was over, and that was a time when TV actors were not doing film. But it seems like that stigma has broken down now.

How are the residuals?
On Confessions of a Teen Idol, I show a residual check from the Netherlands for $16.21.

So you're still making money off Baywatch.
You bet! And hopefully, someday my kids will, too. They'll be going, "Look! Four dollars!" But it does add up.

Do you still wear a red Speedo?
Only at night. Or if you pay a lot of money, I'll put it on.

What's the thing most people are shocked to learn about you?
That I'm from Massachusetts; that I have a good education.

You're half Iraqi. Explain the blond hair and blue eyes.
My maternal grandmother was born in Finland, so there's a big Scandinavian influence there. My Dad's Iraqi and the name was originally Al-Chokachi, but people are always like, "What kinda name is that? Japanese?"

Do people on the street ever call you Cody Madison?
Oh, God, yeah. I was fortunate enough to be flown down to Argentina to receive a lifetime achievement award from some supermodel. Anyway, everyone there was calling me Cody, no matter how often I said, "No, it's David." So Cody Madison lives on.

There's a parlor game that says your porn name is the name of your first pet and that of the street you grew up on. What would yours be?
Layla Raffini.

I'm sensing a little tranny action.
I'm not afraid.

How many hours a day do you work out?
If you count surfing as a workout, usually two hours. I do something called stand-up surfing, so it's a total-body workout.

In Witchblade, you did that nude shower scene. How does it feel to be a lust object?
I think it's fantastic. When we were shooting it, they actually have this sock-like thing that you're supposed to put on your member, and I was like, "I'll just do it naked." They insisted, because they were worried about the dailies leaking out. It was pretty funny. And when I'm 70, I can look back at that and say, "I used to be in shape."

Where are you most famous?
For some reason South American countries really got into Baywatch. A couple of years ago, we were in Chile, going through immigration in this really small fishing village, and the guy stamping my passport yells, "Cody Madison!" Then he jumped up and started taking pictures with his cell phone. It made the front page of the newspaper. [Laughs.]

Do people assume you're dumb because you're so pretty?
I don't think I'm pretty, but I do think that people tend to judge quickly and unfairly based upon someone's looks. You know what I mean. People probably think you're stupid because you're so beautiful.

Who's your secret celebrity crush?
Male or female?

Both.
Male? Richard Simmons. Female? I can't say, because I'll get in trouble with my wife.

What's next for you, career-wise?
I'd love to get onto a gritty, edgy series, or something involving the outdoors. Maybe something for the Discovery Channel or Animal Planet.

If I were drowning, would you give me mouth-to-mouth?
You bet. 1,000 percent. ✖✖✖

Our annual list of Boston's most eligible bachelors and bachelorettes

BY JONATHAN SOROFF //////// PHOTOGRAPHS BY MIKE SPEARS

LOVE MAY BE A MANY-SPLENDORED THING, but it can also be damned elusive. That's why, in this season of paeans to Cupid and coupledom, we traditionally celebrate the singles.

Boston is full-to-bursting with fascinating, accomplished, attractive, unattached people. So while all those smug marrieds and tedious twosomes canoodle over champagne and chocolates this Valentine's Day, we offer our annual lineup of Boston's Most Eligible Bachelors and Bachelorettes.

This year's batch includes smarties and hotties from all walks of life and in every age range—from post-doc to middle age. It also includes one gay man and one lesbian, as per the ratio in the general population. Some of them came to us through our magazine ballot, others were discovered by friends and staffers. But the selection process was tough. We were spoiled for choice.

The one thing they all have in common is that they're the sort of exceptional, well-rounded individuals with whom we'd want our friends to fix us up. However, a caveat is in order: Just because they appear in this article doesn't mean that they're desperate to hear from you. All of them lead full, busy, active lives, and while a little romance is always welcome, they're focused on their careers and interests rather than on finding another person to make them complete.

So here's to Boston's Most Eligible Singles, Class of 2009—proof that being a free agent is far from being undesirable.

Zachariah Hickman

30, musician & mustache wax mogul

A TRUE ICONOCLAST, he was born in North Carolina and raised in Lynchburg, Va. ("the buckle of the Bible belt—home to both Jerry Falwell and the Fleet Enema Corporation"). At Oberlin, he received a bachelor of arts in English literature and a bachelor of music (from the prestigious Oberlin Conservatory) in jazz double bass performance. He was also a member of Phi Beta Kappa and the National Honors Society. A bassist and multi-instrumentalist, he has recorded and toured for over a decade with neo-folk phenomenon Josh Ritter. He also fronts a bluegrass band called Barnstar, and he produces records for local talents like Mark Erelli and Laura Cortese. He's appeared on Late Show With David Letterman and Late Night With Conan O'Brien, has gotten in trouble for handing out bottle rockets at the Lizard Lounge, and when he was 22, staged a 45-person circus called The Odditorium, featuring a freak show, trapeze acts and a full 10-piece band. Not surprisingly, he now runs a variety show/vaudeville evening known as Zack Hickman's House of Ill Repute. As if all that weren't colorful enough, he makes and markets his own brand of mustache wax, concocted in his kitchen using beeswax from his father's apiary, called Dr. Zachariah's Mustache Conditioning Wax and Gravity Suppressant. His other hobbies include studying circus history, cooking, mixology and collecting bizarre musical instruments, like an electric scorpion bass, an Eb Peck horn and a sousaphone that resembles the Loch Ness monster. On off nights, you can find him candlepin bowling at Sacco's Bowl Haven or rooting for the Boston Massacre in a roller-derby match. It doesn't get any quirkier, and there's never a dull moment.

Patty Brennan
for Starwood Caribbean

Jessica Lynn
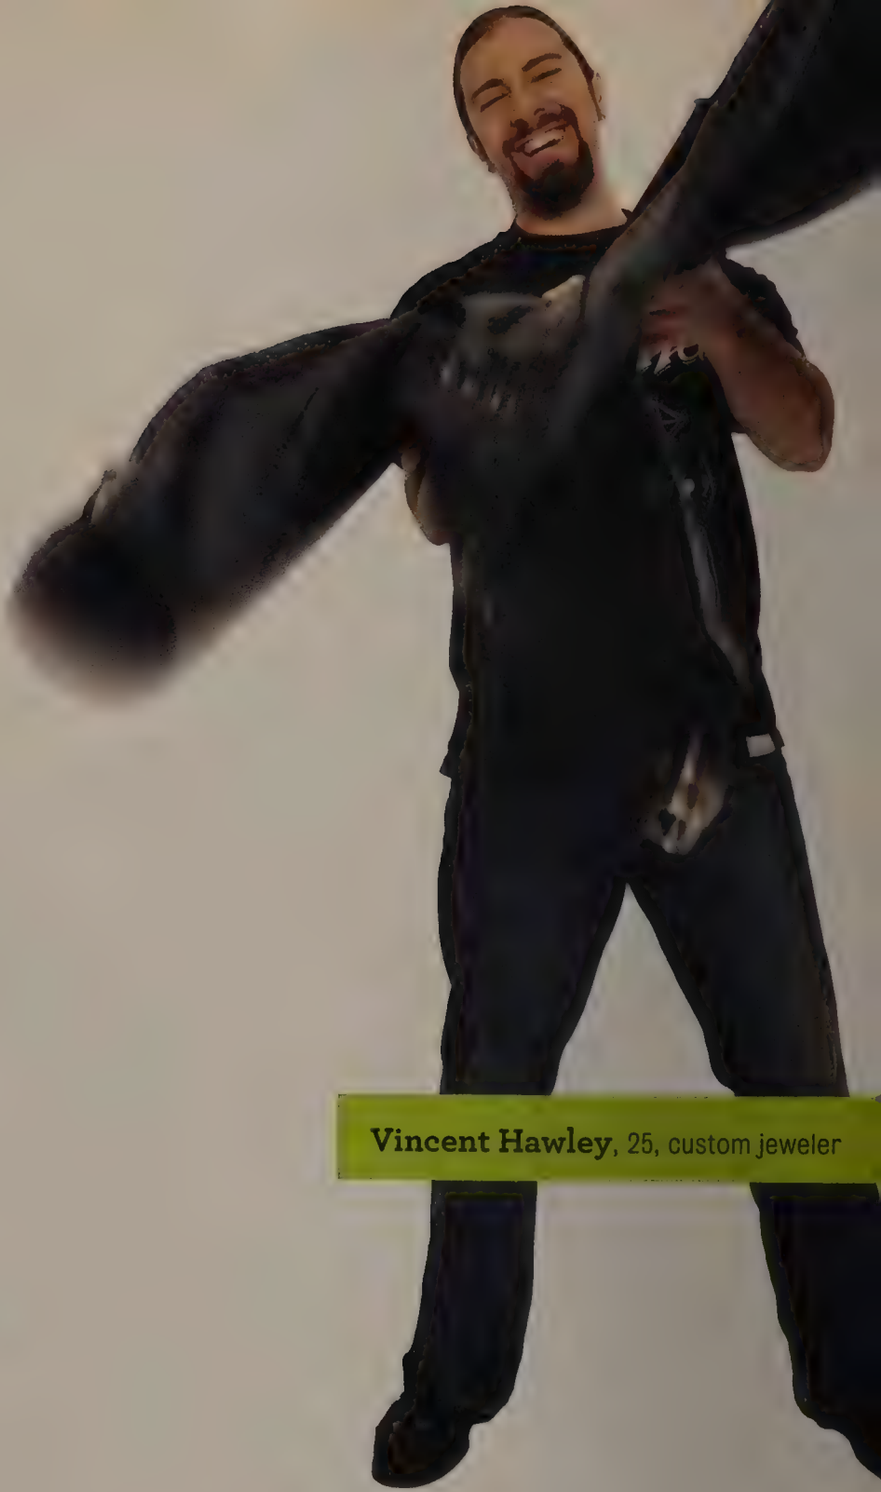
of Leokadia, Inc.



BORN AND RAISED in the Chicago area, this corn-fed cutie earned her bachelor's from the University of New Hampshire. Working in sales for Starwood's properties in the Caribbean means she spends a fair amount of time in various tropical paradises (hence the healthy glow), but she enjoys other travel, as well as golf, water sports and hiking. She's a student of Spanish (she's going to attend a language school in Guatemala) and volunteers with Boston Cares. She's also run a half marathon to raise money for Dana-Farber. Her two dogs—Shelby (a black lab mix) and Dakota (a golden retriever)—receive the lion's share of her affection. Her adventurous nature has led her to climb Mt. Kilimanjaro, bungee jump in New Zealand, surf in Hawaii and go white-water rafting. As one of six girls, she knows how to relate to her own sex (as well as to the opposite one), and her infectious laugh is one of her most distinguishing characteristics. Best of all, she's still enamored of her adopted home, saying, "I love to explore the neighborhoods of Boston. I never quite tire of all the history." We're just glad she decided to stay here.

LIVING THE DREAM IS THE BEST way to describe this Connecticut native, who inherited her mother's passion for shoes and turned it into a thriving business. Her boutique is located on Tremont Street in the South End, while her online store allows women outside of Boston to benefit from her flawless eye and penchant for discovering unique styles and designs. Always one step ahead of the fashion curve, she graduated cum laude from Northeastern and immediately used her entrepreneurial skills to grow her business to the point where the web channel Shoetube.tv films at her store twice a week. Business takes her to trade shows everywhere from Las Vegas to Europe, where she spent her summers growing up and feels perfectly at home. An accomplished pianist and a former dancer, she trained in ballet, jazz and modern dance, and now enjoys shaking her groove thang out on the town. She also loves running, horseback riding, tennis and such thrill-seeking pursuits as sky-diving. She has raised funds for Multiple Sclerosis (from which her father suffers), the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation, the National Ovarian Cancer Coalition and Lonie Paxton's Active Force Foundation. A member of the National Society of Collegiate Scholars and the South End Business Alliance, she was profiled by WCVB-TV Channel 5's Chronicle and has recently become active with such women's groups as the Downtown Boston Women's Club and Hello Stiletto shoe club. A devoted cat owner and self-professed animal lover, she was named Boston's Biggest Flirt in 2006 by the Boston Event Guide. Gentlemen, start your engines.

BEYOND THE BOYISH CHARM and preppy exterior, this wildly entertaining young product of the Groton School and Duke University (which recently named him CEO of the Month) is a person of tremendous depth and foresight. A native of Boston, he is the cofounder and CEO of First Help Financial, an auto lender that services recent Latino immigrants and helps them achieve mobility in their adoptive country. He is also a founder and the executive director of the Trickle Up Effect, a nonprofit that sells deeply discounted goods to disadvantaged and homeless individuals, enabling them to start micro-enterprises as street vendors and eventually make the transition to full-time employment and self-sufficiency. Despite such high-minded pursuits, he's more fun than the proverbial barrel of monkeys. An avid music fan and amateur musician, he plays pretty much every sport to stay in shape and enjoys collecting original lithographs from the period between 1890 and 1950. A fellow at the Industry Entrepreneurs of Boston, he's a member of the Duke Club of Boston, the Union Boat Club and the Neighborhood Association of the Back Bay, where he lives. He loves the nightlife, has got to boogie and won't hesitate to make himself look ridiculous in the name of fun. Brilliant, buoyant and infectiously enthusiastic, he's the antithesis of the uptight WASP. And although he has the good looks, he's completely without the entitled attitude. Any woman lucky enough to snag him will need a nuclear reactor's worth of energy to keep up.

Parker Treacy
25, finance/social entrepreneur

Vincent Hawley, 25, custom jeweler

A NORTH SHORE NATIVE, he received his BFA from the School of the Museum of Fine Arts and studied at the Gemological Institute of America in Florence, Italy, as well as apprenticing for two years with a Florentine master jeweler. He now owns VWH Jewelry, designing and fabricating his own work, which he describes as "one-of-a-kind luxury—unique and contemporary fine-art jewelry mainly focused on classic Florentine engraving." Not surprisingly, his artistic interests include classic and contemporary jewelry, the Italian Renaissance, photography and visiting museums. To stay fit, he practices the martial art kempo. He also surfs and cycles, and he relaxes by reading, listening to music and cooking. Lest he sound too high-brow, his other passions are death metal, Harleys, classic cars, good wine and good Scotch, and his charitable involvements include the Josh Beckett Foundation and fighting ALS/Lou Gehrig's Disease. A study in contradictions, he's a member of United Shaolin Kempo and the Boston Metro Church Softball League, but is prone to show up for meetings with clients wearing a Punisher T-shirt. An aesthete without the attitude, he's a gem just waiting for some lucky woman to wrap him around her little finger.

Maureen Toomey
34, director of sales and catering for the Eliot Hotel, Clio and Uni

A NEW BEDFORD NATIVE, this multifaceted jewel received her bachelor's degree in education from Bridgewater State and a master's from Cambridge College, before working as an elementary school teacher for 10 years. While teaching fifth grade in Atlanta, she had a life-changing experience when a student was diagnosed with a brainstem glioma. "Keegan was a 10-year-old who taught me more about life in six months than I could have learned in a lifetime," she says. She credits the experience with teaching her to appreciate every moment, good or bad. Today, she's the go-to gal for Ken Oringer's award-winning restaurants, a job that immerses her in the glamorous world of high-end dining. And she's great at what she does—her work has helped the hotel and its restaurants win accolades on Condé Nast's Top 710 Hotels in the World, Travel and Leisure's Top 500 Hotels in the World and countless awards. In her time off, she enjoys live music, reading, running, skiing, hiking and pretty much anything that involves the ocean. A rabid Duke basketball fan (go, Blue Devils!), she also roots for all the hometown teams. Although she belongs to the Boston Young Professionals Association, Boston Luxury Properties and the Massachusetts Lodging Association (which nominated her as a "Star of the Industry"), she still finds time to volunteer for the United Way of Greater New Bedford and the Muscular Dystrophy Association. A dog and cat lover, she's the hospitality industry's answer to Wonder Woman and one helluva catch.

THIS ROCK-SOLID PILLAR of the community was born and raised in Rhode Island, attending La Salle Academy in Providence before earning a degree from Stonehill College in 1989. He's been the managing partner of one of Beacon Hill's favorite hangouts, the Paramount, since its opening in 1996. The line for weekend breakfast still snakes out the door and down the block, customers coming in droves for the delicious grub and reasonable prices. More recently, he opened Four Burgers in Central Square, which aims to serve the best all-natural burgers to carnivores and vegetarians alike (there are veggie, turkey and salmon options). Despite the demanding hours of the restaurant industry, he still finds time to be a competitive athlete, participating in Ironman Triathlons, cycling, skiing and trail-running (which explains the rockin' bod). He also enjoys saltwater fly fishing and hiking. On the cerebral side, he's a theater and museum buff who consciously tries to reduce his carbon footprint through green living and technology. Since his restaurants are part of the fabric of their neighborhoods, they're constantly involved in charitable efforts. "I'm a big believer in giving back to the communities that support you and your business," he says. He's a board member of the Boston Athletic Association and the Teen AIDS Peer Corps, which educates youth worldwide about the risk of HIV/AIDS. As an entrepreneur, he strives to do well by doing good, and as an athlete, he tries to push himself beyond his physical, mental and emotional limits. Any woman interested in snagging him had better eat her Wheaties.

41, restaurateur

DON'T LET HIS STRIKING GOOD LOOKS or slammin' dancer's bod fool you. Our gay bachelor, a rising star in one of the country's premier ballet companies, is more than just a pretty face. Born and raised in Marin County, Calif., he was the first American to receive a full scholarship to Canada's National Ballet School in Toronto, which emphasizes academics as much as dance. Upon graduating, he won the prestigious Peter Dwyer Award for remarkable promise, and director Mikko Nissenen recruited him to join Boston Ballet. In 2005, he received the Princess Grace Fellowship, and in 2006, he received a proclamation from the mayor of San Rafael, Calif., for his outstanding achievements. Not too shabby for someone so young. A born perfectionist, his grueling rehearsal and performance schedules somehow don't interfere with his many other interests, which include sculpting, painting, fashion design, photography and home decorating, as well as exploring his Vietnamese heritage. A well-oiled machine, his career commands the lion's share of his athletic energy, although occasionally he'll join a group of colleagues for a soccer match and, in his words, "end up being stuck trying to keep up with the Spaniards." Although a knee injury has sidelined him for the remainder of this season, he maintains an upbeat attitude and will undoubtedly take center stage next year. Passionate about the arts in general, he's equally passionate about his two pet Chihuahuas, Ella and Coca. Oh, and did we mention? He's an excellent cook. It's a wonder some Prince Charming hasn't already swept him off his feet.

John Lam, 24, soloist with the Boston Ballet

Rachael Price, 23, jazz singer

David Ettlinger, 31, school teacher

THE KIND OF BOY you'd be proud to bring home to mother, he's handsome, nurturing and an all-around good guy. A native of New Jersey, he was raised in Newton and attended Newton South before earning a bachelor's degree from the University of Wisconsin and his master's in education from Framingham State. As a second-grade teacher in the Newton school system, his responsibilities include teaching subjects like reading and math, as well as tying shoelaces, reading Winnie-the-Pooh aloud and counseling concerned parents (obviously, he's excellent dad material). Outside the classroom, he enjoys swimming, biking, running triathlons, rock climbing, camping, hiking, scuba diving and skiing. In short, he's an irresistible cross between Mr. Mom and the great outdoorsman. Photography is an artistic pursuit, and he's tried to teach himself guitar three times (with limited success). As well as volunteering at his school and a local food bank, he finds time to keep up memberships with the Academic Challenge Task Force and the Respect for Human Differences Committee, not to mention the Masters Swim Team and the Boston Triathlon Club. He's even produced an educational video for parents about reading aloud to their children. His teaching schedule allows him ample time to indulge his passion for travel, to enjoy the company of family and friends and to pursue his outdoor interests. Ask anyone in the school cafeteria: He's all that and a bag of chips.

BORN IN SYDNEY, Australia, and raised in Nashville, Tenn., this sultry songbird received her bachelor of music in Jazz Studies from the New England Conservatory. Since then, her performing career has been on a steady upward trajectory. A soulful interpreter of jazz standards, she's the frontwoman for the Rachael Price Quartet and Lake Street Dive, and she was a semifinalist in the Thelonious Monk International Jazz Competition, as well as a finalist in the Montreux Jazz Festival Voice Competition. Although she enjoys mornings, her profession means that she rarely sees them. Belying her career are her homey hobbies of cooking and baking. A badminton enthusiast ("naturally"), her other interests include midwifery and her two cats, Hank and Stella. She loves all sorts of music ("when done well"), dancing ("mostly in my kitchen"), Bollywood spectaculars and any musical starring Judy Garland or Doris Day. Sardonic, witty and unbelievably talented, she's a golden-throated songbird bound for stardom, and any guy interested in her had better be willing to go along for the ride.

Safraz W. Ishmael, 32, attorney

BORN IN THE TINY South American country of Guyana, this intriguing gentleman lived in a small village until he was nine, when his family moved to the Bahamas (his father is a Guyanese diplomat). He came to the United States to start college at the tender age of 15, and received a bachelor of science in both physics and computer science from the University of Maryland. He went on to earn a master's in physics before attending Georgetown Law School, graduating in 2003. He currently works at a major Boston law firm, where he practices intellectual property litigation. Not surprising for such a worldly person, he's passionate about geoglobal affairs and loves to travel (Spain is his favorite country, so far), and his other interests include West Indian cooking, photography, Bollywood films, cricket and basketball. A 2008 board member of the South Asian Bar Association of Greater Boston (he's of Indian descent), he's a regular at the Foundation Lounge and is always open to new experiences, whether it's playing a murder-mystery game at the Museum of Fine Arts or taking in a boxing match at a random arena outside the city. Here's a true international man of mystery—the mystery being why no woman has gotten her hooks into him as of yet.

Michael Fitzhenry, 41, chef/restaurateur

THERE'S NOTHING SEXIER THAN A CHEF, unless it's a chef without the gargantuan ego and grandiose delusions about what he does. As co-owner and chef at Bay Village's best-kept secret, Mike & Patty's, he's elevated the sandwich shop to gourmet heights. A native of Canada, he grew up in a town "where it wasn't unheard of to ride a snowmobile to school," and he earned his bachelor's in English starting at King's University College at the University of Western Ontario before completing it at York University in Toronto. Film, literature and music are artistic interests, although he says that food trumps them all. "When I wasn't cooking professionally, my hobbies were all about food. I was the type to have yogurt brewing on the counter, a naturally leavened loaf of bread in the oven and salamis curing in the basement. Now I pretty much just come home and chill with the dog." (His black pug is a regular at Olmsted Park.) A former squash player who got sidelined by ankle injuries, he hopes to take the game up again. In the meantime, his favorite form of exercise (and transportation) is his bicycle, which he likes to take on long, leisurely rides through neighborhoods where there's some culinary payoff (a trip through Dorchester and Mattapan, for instance, will include a stop for banh mi and then later a hot dog). With his business partner, Patty, he plans to start doing food writing. Self-deprecating and down-to-earth, he's utterly lacking in pretense but is fully loaded with smarts and talent.

Kathryn Yee, 25, graphic designer

A MASSACHUSETTS native, this creative beauty received a bachelor of fine arts in communications design (with a minor in marketing) from Syracuse University's College of Visual and Performing Arts. She now works for Korn Design, a brand-design and strategy firm with offices in Boston and New York. Her job calls on her to collaborate with clients in creating print, web and packaging materials, specifically in the fields of hospitality and luxury consumer goods. In her downtime, she enjoys photography and travel. Discovering new places, cultures and cuisines provides her with professional inspiration, so she's always on the lookout for ideas from fashion, home décor and stationery. An avid skier, she loves going to Celtics games, while her musical tastes tend toward R&B and hip-hop. She contributes to sports- and arts-related programs for children in developing countries, and she is active with Youth Design Boston, which places students in creative internships throughout the city. She belongs to the American Institute of Graphic Arts. As gorgeous as she is talented, she's an aesthetic omnivore and a true original.

Mark Stuart, 24, Boston Bruins player

IT'S A GENERAL RULE OF THUMB that hockey players are hot if they've still got all their own teeth. But our bachelor is no dumb jock or knuckle-dragging troglodyte. A native of Rochester, Minn., where the mercury habitually dives below zero, it's perhaps inevitable that he took up the sport, but impressive that he's good enough to play professionally. We're assuming his time in the frozen hinterlands also taught him a thing or two about how to warm up a romantic interest on a cold winter night. He went pro after three years at Colorado College, although his intellectual pursuits still include reading, movies and music, and contrary to type, he's an excellent cook. Off the ice, he also enjoys golf, football and the addictive video game Big Buck Hunter, as well as fishing, biking and playing bocce. Besides the NHL Players' Association, he's a member of the Barbershop Lounge, and he's extremely close to his siblings. A firm believer in giving back, he makes frequent public appearances at hospitals and is actively involved with the Boston Bruins Foundation. Unpretentious and self-deprecating, he's the antithesis of the spoiled, puffed-up pro athlete—in short, the type of guy you'd never know was a hockey star, unless you were a fan. Which we are now.

Sarah O'Neill
33, Spanish teacher and riding instructor

OUR LESBIAN BACHELORETTE is the whole enchilada. Hailing from Connecticut, she got her bachelor's degree in Spanish from Mount Holyoke and a masters from UNH, with stints studying abroad in places like Seville and A Coruña. As a member of the language department at a prestigious girls' school, she leads trips abroad to Mexico, Spain and the Dominican Republic, and teaches horseback riding on weekends, nights and during the summer. An accomplished equestrienne herself, she's planning to compete at third or fourth level next summer and says she truly enjoys starting young horses under the saddle as well as retraining horses with bad habits. Her pets include two cats (one obese, the other hungry) and a horse named Isobel whom she says, "Keeps me sane, busy and poor." Her other hobbies include snowboarding, hiking, and snowshoeing, and while she dreams of being "the folksy girl with a guitar," her musical ability is limited to trying to hit the right notes when singing karaoke. A lover of all things beach-related (so long as there's enough sunblock), she's volunteered for such organizations as Habitat for Humanity and Horizons for Homeless Children. She belongs to the Global Awareness Task Force and S.E.E.D. (Seeking Educational Equity and Diversity). What Sister of Sappho wouldn't be lucky to land her?

Anne Allred
27, morning and noon co-anchor on WHDH TV Channel 7

BORN AND RAISED in St. Louis, Mo., she received an academic scholarship to Ohio State, where she studied journalism and cofounded the student-run TV station, which is still going strong. After beginning her career as a reporter for NPR, she eventually landed in Boston, where she arrives at the office every day at 4 am to prep for her broadcast. From 5–7 am, she co-anchors Today in New England, then does news cut-ins for The Today Show. The rest of the morning, she writes news stories that air on the evening broadcasts, before co-anchoring the noon news. Her job has taken her to China to cover the Olympics (where she interviewed Michael Phelps), and she's reported on everything from hurricanes in the Carolinas to the shootings at Virginia Tech. All that adds up to a lot of frequent-flier miles, which she uses to indulge her passion for travel. A self-confessed beach bum (she says she could never live any place landlocked again), she's a devoted golfer—her dad first putting a club in her hands when she was barely out of diapers—and fond of running. A Buckeye football fan, she claims to bleed scarlet and gray, and it is non-negotiable that she return every fall for at least one home game. Happily, she has changed her allegiance from the Cardinals to the Red Sox, proving what a smart cookie she is. Compassionate, too: She's in the process of establishing an Injured Marine Semper Fi Fund in the Boston Area, helping the families of wounded Marines join their loved ones at their bedsides, and she helps raise funds for Angel Flight Northeast, which provides air transport to those in need. She's been nominated for three Emmy Awards and has taken to her adopted city like a fish to water. Obviously, any guy would be lucky to land her, assuming he could keep up with her, that is.

Marina Ortega
34, director of the Boston Celtics Dancers

IT MUST BE HARD HAVING THOUSANDS of rabid basketball fans drooling over you and your squad, but this native Los Angeleno handles it with aplomb. A criminal justice major at Northern Arizona University, she channeled her love of dance into a demanding gig, attending every home game, running rehearsals, choreographing routines and coordinating public appearances and special events. As a member of the game operations department, she's also responsible for implementing creative (and tasteful) ways to integrate the dancers into games, and someday she hopes to open a Celtics Dancers Dance Camp, to inspire young dancers and help them realize their dreams. An example of the old adage "Never stop learning," she frequently signs up for dance classes, and her love of sports extends beyond the parquet to football and baseball. As a dancer, she has a natural affinity for music, and in her downtime she enjoys concerts and musical theater, as well as movies, biographies, travel and good wine and food. A well-made margarita doesn't hurt, either. A fan of all USC athletics, she's proof that you can take the girl out of L.A. but you can't take L.A. out of the girl. Then again, why would you want to?

Renee Pitts
30, doctor

THE ATTRIBUTES that make her an outstanding physician also make her an outstanding catch: a keen intelligence, deep compassion, a curiosity about the world around her and—dare we say it?—a nice bedside manner. Born and raised in the Boston area, she graduated from Boston College as a member of the Psi Chi National Honor Society with a degree in psychology and pre-med. Her fluency in French comes from studying in Paris and Nice, and she earned her MD at Midwestern University. After finishing her internship at St. Elizabeth's in Brighton, she went to Mass. General, where she's doing a fellowship in anesthesiology and critical care. This summer, she'll begin a three-year residency in anesthesiology at St. Elizabeth's. Despite the grueling schedule of a doctor-in-training, she finds time to run, which she says "clears her head," and is currently training for the Boston Marathon, having completed numerous other runs for various charities. Her other charitable endeavors include volunteering at a soup kitchen in her neighborhood. A fan of all the hometown teams, she can often be found catching the game at local haunts like the Sevens, and after 15 years of dance training, she still finds time to take occasional classes at the Cambridge Dance Complex. Her love of dance has also led her to volunteer as a physician for Boston Ballet. Summers find her on Martha's Vineyard as much as possible. Unafraid to try new things, even if it means doing them by herself, she's independent and intrepid, adventurous and vivacious—in short, a ball of fire who's equally bewitching in scrubs or a ball gown.

Martine Severin, 31, blogger

THIS STYLE AVATAR is easy on the eyes and equally easy to talk to, with a rapier wit that shows up often on her blog. Raised in Port-au-Prince, Haiti, and Cambridge, she got her undergraduate degree from Wellesley College and is now doing graduate work in education policy at Harvard. On her blog, she writes about street fashion, aiming to inspire fashion drones and zombies to pay a bit more attention to themselves. "I'm a lone voice crying out for color and proportion in a sea of droopy, gray gabardine, Uggs and moldy, old sweaters," she says. While she does follow the latest trends, she considers fashions on the runway less important than how regular people adapt those fashions to their own personal style. Her other artistic interests include photography. In addition to blogging, she enjoys sewing (quilts and clothing), wine, food and working off the latter two at the gym, saying, "Give me deadlifts, Sumo squats and supersets, and I'm a happy woman." Hence, a figure worthy of Venus. She also enjoys skiing, running, swimming and traveling, and tries to plan one domestic and one international jaunt per year—a tactic that's taken her to South Africa, Spain, Denmark, Haiti, Maine and Baltimore. Her only pet, she jokes, is her sister, and her charitable endeavors include promoting literacy by reading to kids at the Amigos School in Cambridge. A hot tamale with style to spare, she's as fierce as they come and funny, to boot.

Shaka Ramsay

32, cofounder, co-owner, creative director and head buyer for the Achilles Project

THE EPITOME OF THE DOWNTOWN, bohemian scenester, this super-talented whirling dervish has his hands in more pies than we can count. Born in Massachusetts but raised all over the place (Brooklyn, Phoenix, Miami, Helsinki), he received his bachelor's degree from Berklee College of Music, where he established his independent record label, SunMoon, in 1999. As one of the brains behind Fort Point Channel's white-hot boutique-cum-restaurant, he's helped make the place into the de facto honeycomb hideout for the hipster set, overseeing the unique, funky fashions displayed museum-style in rolling cases. His passion for photography has him opening Eye of the Sun Studios in his Fort Point Channel loft, which will also specialize in independent film production, shorts, videos and live audiovisual performances. A technology freak and rabid sports fan, he collects rare music and vinyl as well as sneakers, and goes to see live music as often as any major-label R&R guy. To stay in top form, he plays in a basketball league, although he's just as likely to be catching the latest exhibit at the ICA in his downtime. Not surprisingly, he's a genuine urban trendsetter with his finger on the pulse of stuff you won't know about for another year or two.

A Wild and Swayze Guy

WE HAVE LIFTOFF

AN '80S MOVIE set in the '60s now gets an update for the '00s. Dirty Dancing, the most important film ever made about competitive dancing in the Catskills, is making the leap to the stage. Adapted by its original screenwriter, Eleanor Bergstein, the production tests out its live-performance chops at the Boston Opera House before hitting Broadway. Promising the time of your life, one more time, Dirty Dancing sports 35 songs and plenty of airborne flourishes from its limber cast. Prominent among them is Australian newcomer Josef Brown, who reprises Patrick Swayze's immortal role as Johnny Castle.

Bride Wars ★ ½ Finally, a chick flick for people who hate women. This misogynist, painfully unfunny farce stars Kate Hudson and Anne Hathaway as lifelong best friends who find their weddings accidentally scheduled on the same day. In the world of director Gary Winick, such a misunderstanding instantly transforms the ladies into raging monsters who trash their friendship for a spate of mean-spirited, sitcom-like sabotage attempts. Meanwhile, the families sit idly on the sidelines, though any injection of common sense or compromise would resolve everything instantly. Director Winick's previous work includes the equally ugly Tadpole, about a young teen who falls for his stepmother. It's all enough to make you wonder about Winick's sense of healthy dispositions. Are we supposed to believe that characters could really be so craven, materialistic and cruel? And if so, why would we want to watch a movie about them? (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Che ★★★ Split into two separate movies and running four and a half hours in total, Steven Soderbergh's ambitious epic takes on Ernesto "Che" Guevara, the controversial, dogmatic Marxist revolutionary whom Jean-Paul Sartre once called "the most complete human being of our age." (These days he's best known as the face annoying college kids like to display on their T-shirts.) Soderbergh's movie seeks not to explain or to enlighten, but simply to observe. Absent any of the conventions that ingratiate a character to the audience, the film exists at a curious remove from its subject. Sometimes Che is so detached you'll feel like you're watching it from another room. Soderbergh ignores the material's political trappings to narrowly focus on the brute process of revolt. Benicio Del Toro is fascinating in the lead, but in the end, the movie is an epic of logistics and a mountain of grunt work. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Curious Case of Benjamin Button ★★ David Fincher, the gifted and sardonic director of Fight Club and Zodiac, goes Forrest Gump in this shockingly syrupy take on an old F. Scott Fitzgerald short story. Borrowing the premise and little else from the original work, Button stars Brad Pitt as a quizzical fellow born as a elderly man who ages backwards as the film grinds on. And on. Some gorgeous, state-of-the-art digital effects have been invented to place Pitt's face on all sorts of incongruous bodies, but besides existing as a technical marvel, there's little point to the proceedings. Screenwriter Eric Roth seems to have recycled his Forrest Gump script, changing a few names but keeping the central notion of a bumpkin in a doomed romance naively wandering through blunt historical signposts with a surfeit of cornpone aphorisms. There's no actual conflict as we wait for Pitt to grow young and die, just a lot of pretty pictures, plus the visceral nagging disappointment that a talent as subversive as Fincher's stooped to helming shiny Hollywood sap. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Defiance ★★ Director Edward Zwick, perpetrator of such prestigious snores as Blood Diamond and The Last Samurai, has an uncanny knack for sucking all the excitement out of fascinating real-life stories. Zwick strikes again with Defiance, a stodgy, lugubrious account of the Bielski brothers, who escaped from the Nazi occupation into the Belarusian forest, where they built a makeshift village, teamed up with Russian resistance fighters and protected hundreds from the Holocaust. Daniel Craig stars as Tuvia, who humorlessly assumes command of the refugee camp after his reckless brother Zus (Liev Schreiber) heads out to fight with the Russians. Billy Elliot's Jamie Bell plays another sibling, and there's even an ill-conceived love story tossed in for good measure. In typical Zwick fashion, the over-scaled, curiously bloodless action sequences lack any sense of urgency, and the details of a compelling tale are smothered in Hollywood cheese. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Doubt ★★★ Sometimes subtlety is overrated. Just ask Meryl Streep, who smacks her lips and carves ham as the ferocious Sister Aloysius in John Patrick Shanley's big-screen adaptation of his Pulitzer Prize–winning play. In a Bronx Catholic School circa 1964, Streep's nasty, uptight nun stares daggers at Philip Seymour Hoffman's progressive, freewheeling Father Flynn. But when Flynn's potentially inappropriate relationship with the school's first black student is called into question, we're in for some grand Inside the Actor's Studio explosions. Shanley's meaty moral questionnaire explores the gulf between tradition and modernity in the heightened form of a parable, with Amy Adams' meek Sister James torn between our protagonists. Shanley hasn't directed since 1990's tragically un-

ONLY THE LONELY

Wendy and Lucy is subtle and shrewd, but a little too schmaltzy.

Wendy and Lucy
★★½
Starring Michelle Williams, Wally Dalton, Will Patton, Will Oldham and Larry Fessenden. Written by Kelly Riechardt and Jonathan Raymond. Directed by Riechardt. At Kendall Square Cinema.

ONE THING YOU NEVER see in film or TV is folks worrying about money. Even your garden-variety indie flick tends to take place in an alternate universe where the apartments are all expansive and the credit cards never get declined. I don't know if filmmaker Kelly Riechardt anticipated our financial collapse when she made Wendy and Lucy, but the film's keen sense of panic feels awfully timely as we head toward Great Depression 2.0.

It's a quiet little piece, clocking in at barely 80 minutes and feeling more like a short story than a novel. The hypnotic Michelle Williams, now light years away from Dawson's Creek, stars as Wendy. She's an derrated Joe Versus the Volcano, and while his visuals are fairly perfunctory, he's at least wise enough to embrace his own material's inherent staginess, highlighting the broad theatricality of these performances. You'll never forget you're watching a filmed play, but with a cast like this, who can complain? (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Frost/Nixon ★★ ½ In refashioning Peter Morgan's smash 2006 play for the big screen, director Ron Howard made a wise move casting original stars Michael Sheen and Frank Langella. This picture has a ton of problems, but at the very least, Sheen's sly performance as seemingly callow chat-show host David Frost and Langella's towering Tricky Dick have been preserved on film for posterity. Morgan's play positioned Frost's 1977 televised interviews with Nixon as a David and Goliath battle, a belated national catharsis in which the wily interrogator tripped the disgraced former president into something close to a mea culpa. Where Howard errs is exactly where this terminally dull filmmaker always errs: He treats his audience like imbeciles. We've got all the makings of a brilliant psychodrama playing out in the loaded glares and strategic statements of Sheen and Langella, yet Howard constantly cuts away to a fake documentary format with a peanut gallery of bit players staring straight into the lens and helpfully explaining everything we've just seen. Thanks, Opie. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Gran Torino ★★★ ½ A throwback to Clint Eastwood's cheap and dirty '80s crowd-pleasers, Gran Torino looks like it was shot over the course of a long weekend and cost about $15 to make. It's also extremely entertaining. Eastwood plays a growling, bigoted Korean War vet who gradually warms to a family of Hmong immigrants living next door. As he sputters, spits and cusses his way through scenes, this mean, old dog learns a few new tricks. The movie is pitched at the same hyperbolic level as Eastwood's oversized turn. Designed as his farewell to acting, the movie plays like catnip for longtime fans. There's a valedictory air to the work, studded with explicit references to characters like Harry Callahan, Gunny Highway and Josey Wales. Like his other films, Gran Torino has some satisfying shades of moral uncertainty lurking beneath the surface. But viewers will also get a giddy thrill of seeing a 78-year-old badass pulling a gun on gangbangers and snarling, "Get off my lawn." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Last Chance Harvey ★★★ Unlike Pacino or DeNiro, who keep tarnishing their legacies by trying to headline crummy thrillers, Dustin Hoffman has aged gracefully, settling into quirky supporting roles in offbeat projects. It's a rare pleasure to watch Hoffman take the lead in Joel Hopkins' wispy, AARP riff on Richard Linklater's Before Sunrise. Arriving in London for the wedding of a daughter who'd rather he'd just stayed home, Hoffman's Harvey finds himself wandering the city all night with Emma Thompson's sad-eyed spinster, and the two connect on that chatty, instantly magical level that's probably only possible in the movies. Twee around the margins, Hopkins keeps trying to cram in multicultural kookiness better suited for a Jonathan Demme flick. But the movie works in spite of such missteps, simply because Hoffman and Thompson are so enjoyable to watch. There's a contagious delight these two wonderful performers create by riffing off one another, and even if the movie isn't much, it's a treat spending time with them. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Milk ★★★ ½ Playing the title role in Gus Van Sant's rousing, surprisingly accessible biography of slain civil-rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years: He smiles. Oscar-season biopics often feel like homework, but Van Sant charts Milk's rise to prominence as the first openly gay man elected to public office as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead, who clearly hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High. Eight years ago, this gifted director turned his back on Hollywood, devoting himself to abstract, lyrical films like Gerry, Last Days, and his recent Paranoid Park. In such difficult company, Milk feels startlingly conventional. It's crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining, yet crafted with savvy visual intelligence by Van Sant and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides. Like the inclusive American ideals Milk so boisterously advocated, the movie is open to everybody. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy earnest, mousy hippie attempting to drive from Indiana to Alaska in a beat-up old Honda, accompanied only by some vaguely defined dreams and her yellow mutt, Lucy. It's been a bumpy road, and she's only got about $500 left when her car breaks down in a dead-end Oregon town.

After stupidly trying to shoplift dog food, she's arrested. It's a nothing charge with a middling fine, but the process keeps her downtown long enough for Lucy to go missing. With her broken car, lost dog and rapidly dwindling finances, all Wendy can do is sit in a Walgreens parking lot, press her hands to her face and wait for a lucky break that may never come.

Fun stuff, huh? Well, the good news is that we're in the hands of an extremely talented filmmaker. As in her previous picture, 2006's highly praised but barely seen Old Joy, Riechardt demonstrates a unique understanding of silence and its awful power. That similarly modest feature zeroed in on a camping trip undertaken by two longtime pals, the awkward chasms in their conversation filled by the haunting notion that these two friends had grown irretrievably apart and were just starting to realize that themselves. Attuned to the vast indifference of nature, there's a wide emptiness to Riechardt's framing that emphasizes the characters' smallness, adrift as they are in a pitiless world.

Williams is in tune with Riechardt's sensibilities, as her character never asks for sympathy or displays a shred of vanity. Curled up in her shapeless, tattered hoody beneath a tousled bob of black hair, Wendy hardly works at endearing herself to others. We receive very little information about where she's been or what she's running from. With Wendy's pensive stillness and idealized image of Alaska, it's hard not to think of a tamped-down version of Into the Wild, if only Chris McCandless had been mopey instead of pompous.

There are a few faint glimmers of compassion. A chatty security guard, nicely played by Wally Dalton, allows Wendy to use his cell phone from time to time. The great character actor Will Patton turns up as an auto mechanic who at least tries to cut her a break on the towing charge. But this is a world of finite resources, and even the kindest folks can only help so much.

Based on the story "Train Choir" by Jonathan Raymond (who cowrote the script with Riechardt), Wendy and Lucy could just as easily be called When Bad Things Happen to Sad People. Speaking as someone who just junked a rusted-out Honda of his own, there's no movie that better captures the horrific anxiety of waiting for your mechanic to return with an estimate. But despite the fine filmmaking and stellar acting on display, after about an hour, the film starts to feel like a misery pig-pile.

I blame the dog. Animals are always the easiest way to wring sobs from audiences. For proof, just take a gander at the ridiculous grosses for Marley and Me. Wendy's diminishing options and increasingly hopeless situation are evocative enough, did she really have to lose her dog, too? It's refreshing to see Riechardt exploring economic realities that other filmmakers don't dare face, but tossing in some shameless canine tear-jerking is gilding the lily.

Or maybe I'm just a cat person. ✖✖✖ from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (In the suburbs.)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in suburbs.)

Taken ★★ ½ Here's another slick, lurid thriller from writer/producer Luc Besson in which the French director employs his trademark blend of brutal action sequences and mawkish sentimentality. It's a tricky mix that Besson got just right in 1994's The Professional, but he's found diminishing returns ever since. Liam Neeson stars as a retired CIA assassin turned overprotective dad. He blanches at his precious teenage daughter's wishes to follow U2 across Europe, and it turns out father really does knows best, because young Kim (Maggie Grace) has barely stepped off the plane in Paris when she's kidnapped by snarling Albanian sex traffickers. What follows is a brisk procession of ass-whoopings, with towering, tree-trunk Neeson snapping limbs and tossing corpses all along the Seine. It's completely preposterous and more than a little stupid, but director Pierre Morel knows his way around a fight sequence, and his burly leading man injects a surprising gravitas to a one-note, Jack Bauer knockoff. Neeson's early monologue, threatening his daughter's kidnappers, is itself almost worth the price of admission. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Unborn ★ Call me crazy, but isn't it a bit tacky to use the Holocaust as a plot point in a teenybopper thriller? One where the main motivation is to provide underwear shots of comely starlet Odette Yustman? Writer/director David Goyer, best known for penning the latest Batman flicks, has helmed a heck of a confounding mess here. It's like the Jewish version of The Exorcist by way of a Maxim photo shoot. The blank Yustman finds herself haunted by a dybbuk, a possibly demonic twin brother she may have accidentally strangled in utero. How the story begins at Auschwitz is too convoluted and exploitative to be explained in brief, but on the bright side, we get the bizarre sight of Gary Oldman as a mild-mannered rabbi who blows a bedazzled shofar and reacts with spectacular nonchalance when confronted by backwards-headed hellhounds. Honestly, I had no idea what was going on most of the time. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Valkyrie ★★ ½ Tom Cruise is more famous these days for bizarre behavior than blockbusters, so in desperate need of career rehab, he tries to kill Hitler. Cruise stars as Colonel Claus von Stauffenberg, a Nazi with a conscience, whose suitcase bombing nearly took out der Führer in WWII's waning days. It's a handsomely mounted production directed with brisk efficiency by Bryan Singer, and as a pal surmised, "It will probably be wicked suspenseful for anybody who didn't pay attention in history class." Short on characterization and long on Hitchockian set pieces, Valkyrie is leaner than your typical WWII drama. Normally this might be a refreshing change of pace, but absent a compelling point of view, the movie is too focused on the nuts and bolts of an assassination attempt that we already know was a failure. It's hard to get yourself invested. Cruise remains tediously noble, and despite the period trappings, it's not really so different from one of his Mission: Impossible movies. (At Boston Common, Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

Waltz With Bashir ★★ ½ Sifting through long-buried memories of Israel's 1982 Lebanon war, Ari Folman's autobiographical documentary tells a story from so many standpoints and with such lack of affect that the movie remains elusive. The animation style is both striking and off-putting. It resembles the rotoscoping used in Waking Life and Chicago 10, but Waltz was created with a mix of Flash, 3-D and traditional animation techniques, so certain scenes look more like a Web site than a movie. Some events are dramatized while others are simply recited straight into the camera. The surreal combat scenes are memorable and harrowing, but Folman's use of repressed memory syndrome as a cliffhanger device feels phony and cheapens the material with Hollywood conventions. The aloof, distant quality of the film gnaws at you, and not even a final flourish of sickening, real-life photography can bridge the gap. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Wrestler ★★★★ The movie is shrewd enough to use Mickey Rourke's decimated visage to its advantage. Hell, it's practically a monument to his personal ruin. Rourke's washed-up wrestler, Randy "The Ram," is a teetering wreck who doesn't stand a chance of recapturing his former glory, and every close-up hammers that point home. Faced with a health crisis, he makes a few efforts. He reaches out to a sympathetic stripper (well played by Marisa Tomei) who similarly finds herself growing too old for her profession. He briefly attempts to reconnect with his estranged daughter (Evan Rachel Wood), but all the damage he inflicted in the past can't be easily undone. The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions, it simply asks that we spend a little time with these people and live inside their world for a spell. Here, at last, is a true sequel to the original Rocky, full of quiet desperation, squalid backdrops and earthy humor. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square, Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

Domo Arigato Mr. Takahata If you think Japanese animation is just about oddly colored hair, seizure-inducing lights and Sailor Moon-esque characters, then you haven't seen anything good. Afterward, Tufts professor Susan J. Napier, author Roland Kelts and the Pulitzer Prize–winning historian John W. Dower discuss the film. This is no Pokémon.

TRANSFORMATION

Thievery Corporation plays House of Blues Feb. 24.

Andy Leguz

THIEVERY CORPORATION taps countless sources. The production duo of Rob Garza and Eric Hilton blends Jamaican dub, jazz, Brazilian bossa nova, hip-hop and Indian music into ambient funk so seamless that it's easy to miss the pointed lyrics about shadow governments and socio-economic disparities.

That the lyrics can be steeped in metaphor or occasionally sung in a foreign language further blur the intent and identity of the D.C.-based group, which has been unfairly relegated to the label of downtempo or chill-out music.

Thievery Corporation's new Radio Retaliation clarifies the vibe with its Grammy-nominated packaging. The foldout CD sleeve drops quotes from such revolutionary thinkers as Gandhi and Zapata, Voltaire and Einstein, Joe Strummer and Fela Kuti, whose simple epitaph is "Music is the weapon."

Among the guest vocalists on the record is Femi Kuti, son of the Afrobeat icon, who rails against third-world corruption in "Vampires," while Brazil's Seu Jorge muses about internal peace in "Hare Krsna." They're just two extremes on a disc that mixes global sounds and issues into a smooth, unified flow. And on the local side, Washington go-go legend Chuck Brown even surfaces to fuel the hard, funky truth of "The Numbers Game," about neighborhood gambling with loaded dice.

"You can get in and decipher the music a bit, because it's working on so many different levels," Garza says, adding that while he appreciates that people can dig beyond the surface, "I don't think everybody needs to get the point."

In turn, despite the duo's broad-minded influx of style and spirit, Thievery Corporation doesn't overload the sound.

"Part of the trick is knowing when to stop and not to drown [the recording] with layers that you think would sound cool until it turns to mush," Garza says. "I like the idea of the music having space and being able to breathe. If you look at genres like dub or bossa nova, they have a lot of space for the melodies to permeate through the rhythms."

"The trick is knowing when to stop. I like the idea of the music having space and being able to breathe."

Garza and Hilton realized they shared an affinity for dub and bossa nova, as well as genres from punk to Eastern music, when a mutual friend introduced the two men in 1995. "We thought it would be great to find a way to take all of these sounds that we were really into and do something modern," Garza says, "to give them an electronic edge."

Garza, 38, and Hilton, 43, maintain a reputation as DJs, but when it comes to creating music, they're really quite old-school. In the studio, they play the bulk of the bass, keyboards and guitars on basic tracks before adding horns and percussion, then edit all the results through software.

"[Songs] actually do develop organically, and it's not like we take other people's grooves," Garza says, noting how other electronic artists "find a good sample and just rely on the hook or the bass lines of that particular track."

Live, it's another story, as Thievery Corporation expands into a cast of a dozen or more. Garza and Hilton anchor the band from a post of turntables, samplers and effects while musicians add guitar, sitar, bass, percussion and horns. A rotating cast of singers (including Jamaican toaster Sleepy Wonder and Iranian vocalist Lou Lou) front the ensemble.

"We're fans of live music and a big sound," Garza says. "It can be quite explosive. When people come to the shows, it can make them go back and hear the records differently."

And when Thievery Corporation hits Boston's new House of Blues on Feb. 24 as part of its first tour in four years, the general-admission floor of the 2,400-capacity venue should fill the bill. "We don't really like playing the seated auditoriums," he says. "It's just better when people are drinking and free to move around and not be confined."

Spoken like someone who cherishes freedom on all fronts. ✖✖✖

Lap-Pop

When Michael Angelakos recorded Chunk of Change as a Valentine's Day gift for his girlfriend, he couldn't imagine that a year later the six-track EP would take him and his bandmates on a worldwide tour. An Emerson College alum, Angelakos fronts Cambridge-based Passion Pit, a band born from his laptop-synthesizer experiment. Passion Pit's catchy, danceable indie-pop tunes landed the band on the BBC's "Sound of 2009" list of emerging acts, and captivated audiences throughout the blogosphere. Now at work on their first full-length album, the boys are splitting their time between the studio and the road, stopping by at the Middle East on Feb. 6 for a homecoming performance.

Band Made

All You Need Is Art The Beatles conquered America 45 years ago with their infectious pop singles. When Jordan's Furniture and 100.7 WZLX host the Revolution exhibit Feb. 5–8, Beatlemaniacs will get to enjoy the icons' other talents: artwork by Paul McCartney, John Lennon and Ringo Starr. Fans can purchase the masterpieces while they rub shoulders with Ron Campbell, who animated the Beatles film Yellow Submarine. After all, you really ought to be sitting comfortably in a new La-Z-Boy if you're watching hallucinatory cartoons.

THE A.R.T. OF THE MATTER

A Fine How D'You Do...

Anyone interested in all the petty politics, intrigue and backbiting that went into selecting a new artistic director for the American Repertory Theatre (c'mon—it's Harvard, for Christ's sake) would have forgotten it completely and been dazzled by the choice if they'd been at the cocktail party to introduce her.

For starters, Diane Paulus is a freelance director born and raised in New York and comes to the A.R.T. from Columbia, yet she doesn't act like Manhattan is the center of the universe (even for theater). For another, her vision for the A.R.T. is anything but academically sterile and overly cerebral (she wants to see people dancing in their seats or booing if they feel like it).

All this was revealed to a select crowd who gathered at the Back Bay digs of catering mogul Dan Mathieu and his husband, Tom Potter (a contender for handsomest man in Boston in the not-stuck-up category). Also on hand: cohosts Rebecca and Nathan Milikowsky, adventuress Linda Schwabe, party planner non-pareil Bryan Rafanelli, real estate giant Tony Pangaro, Our Lady of Chanel Mary Nobile King, patrons of the arts Andy and Rachael Goldbfarb, one woman who responded to a compliment on her earrings by saying, "I really appreciate that, because someone recently asked me if they were IUDs," and another who said, "I like the winter," to which her friend responded, "I like three daily nonstop flights to San Juan."

One guest, meanwhile, bitched about attending so many parties catered by Mathieu's company (Max Ultimate Foods), that he claimed the mogul owed him a gym membership. Elsewhere, a small crew snuck into the couple's bedroom to play with their excitable cairn terrier puppies, Herbie and Harrie.

However adorable they are, Paulus was the evening's undeniable star and kept the room riveted with a description of her vision for the theater's future.

"I want to see a line for the Acela at Penn Station," she said, "of people coming from New York to Boston to see theater."

Leave the Witch's Mammary Glands Out of It...

You've really got to believe in a cause to go out on a night when the mercury dives well below zero, and a stiff wind is howling.

Neal Balkowitsch, Linda Schwabe and Tom Potter at the A.R.T. party

Amy d'Ablemont Burnes at the Max Warburg dinner

Stephanie Warburg and Katie Bleakie at the Max Warburg dinner

Among those who do are the big-name, deep-pocketed crowd who braved the elements (or at least a ride in an overheated, chauffer-driven Town Car) to get to the Mandarin Oriental for the Max Warburg Courage Curriculum dinner, benefiting a Boston Public Schools program named after a 12-year-old boy who died of leukemia (and who happened to be a member of the prominent banking family). One of the program's biggest proponents joked that she'd probably lose her job in the Boston School Department for saying: "For most sixth-graders, the schools' curriculum isn't relevant to their lives. This is."

On hand to insure its continued success were Warburg's swanlike mother, Stephanie, and her son Fred, cochairs Katie Bleakie and Susan Bloomberg, über-philanthropists Ted and Joan Cutler, real estate gazillionaire Arthur Winn with his stunning wife, Alicia, and equally stunning daughter-in-law, Karen, Warburg intimates Ann and Graham Gund and Joan Bennett Kennedy (the first Mrs. Ted), petite ball-of-fire Dola Stemberg (the second Mrs. Staples, whose ex-husband, Tom, was one of the evening's sponsors), statuesque brunette Barbara Jordan, real estate butterfly Jane Moss, the fashion trifecta of Sukey Forbes Bigham, Kristina Lyons and Nancy Adams, party pair Charles and Patty Ribakoff, Judge Nonnie Burns, and the Nor'easters, an a capella group from Northeastern, who sang a few sets.

On her way out the door, one woman stopped to tuck away the book of award-winning essays by Boston schoolchildren left at every place setting, to which her husband grumbled, "Courage? It was brave to come out on such a freezing, goddamn night and donate money in this economy."

Guess the Fashion Editor...

Congratulations to Kelley Doyle, communications director at the Boston Harbor Hotel, who correctly guessed that the fashion editor photographed from the waist down in our Jan. 21 issue was The Herald's Jill Radsken. For that, Doyle will receive an Improper Bostonian T-shirt. Unfortunately, she didn't know that Radsken's dress was designed by Italian couturier Alberta Ferretti, so she forfeits a coffee mug. But we could all stand to be a little less caffeinated, yes? ✖✖✖

Fop of the Morning to You

With the implosion of the financial system and the economy plunging into a sickening death spiral, thoughts turn to spring. To languid afternoons in the sunlight. Lilacs. Nymphs and swains vigorously tweaking their sonnets in the grass. And to new pants, since my winter ones are caked with road salt.

Fashion—a mistress of fickle heart and high-heeled boot—is the theme of this issue. Sure, any award-winning children's book will tell you that true beauty is about what's inside, which means that ping-pong balls are horrid. Even so, fashion editor Ruth Basloe's upbeat styles prove that outer beauty can be pretty appealing. Her outfits will inspire you to ditch the "Scott of the Antarctic" ensembles of the past four months and put on a pencil skirt or its male equivalent. Renewal, after all, isn't just a matter for agricultural fertilizer. You can also get a whiff of it with a new pair of sneakers (see page 9).

Since clothes don't make the man, it's a good idea to accessorize. We've got lots of tasteful doodads that will tickle your sense of covetousness and send even the most breathless fashion-blogger sprinting for his or her thesaurus. What's another way to say, "I want to possess this handbag and bask in its reflected glamour"?

The Shoe Must Go On

SOLE SURVIVOR

UNDER THE CLOCK tower in an old brick mill in Lawrence sits a scientist mad about sneakers. "The foot is a pretty impressive thing," says Trampas TenBroek, manager of New Balance's Sports Research Lab. "Somebody knew what they were doing when they designed it."

Using devices with intimidating names like "servo-hydraulic cyclic motion simulator" (a robotic leg that mimics a runner's step) and "glass force plate" (a super-sensitive scale), TenBroek tests foam, scrutinizes videos of marathoners and even sinks baskets while sporting the company's latest spring line.

"I'm one of the few people who can say they have a basketball hoop in their office," he says. "So I guess I'm doing something right."

A North Dakota native who came East to earn a doctorate in kinesiology—the study of human motion—at UMass Amherst, TenBroek, 30, joined New Balance in June, when he helped design the lab. His graduate studies proved perfect for the job.

"I'm interested in why people run differently barefoot than when they have shoes on," TenBroek says, describing how shod runners land on their heels but favor their toes while au natural.

Most Bostonians would be loathe to run along the Esplanade without sneakers, especially this winter. But barefoot running strengthens the feet in myriad ways, says TenBroek, citing the famed shoeless runners of Africa. "If you offered them a pair of New Balance's finest shoes," he says, "I'm not sure if they would take them." JOHN DYER

What War Is Good For

"Basically what you're looking at is a lot of booze and not a lot of mixers," master sommelier Santiago Saenz says of the Foreign Legion, a cocktail that appropriately takes no prisoners.

Like a lonely signpost by a minefield, the Tangierino menu description simply reads: "Four countries that know how to drink. For cocktailers only." The nations slandered as boozehounds are: England (Tanqueray gin), Poland (Belvedere vodka), Scotland (Drambuie) and Italy (Gozio amaretto). One can't help but feel slighted that Jack Daniels wasn't asked to serve. And though the French created the Foreign Legion, their omission is understandable, given their warring track record and penchant for things bubbly.

Despite the formidable collection of arms, the Foreign Legion ($12) tastes much lighter than you'd anticipate. "The balance is there, so you know what you're drinking," says Saenz, who designed the cocktail. "It starts strong, and you go through the gin and vodka, and then when you least expect it, you get the amaretto, so the finish is light and airy." It does pack a punch, so the name is appropriate. But it also goes down easy; maybe there's some French to it after all. NICK ALTSCHULLER

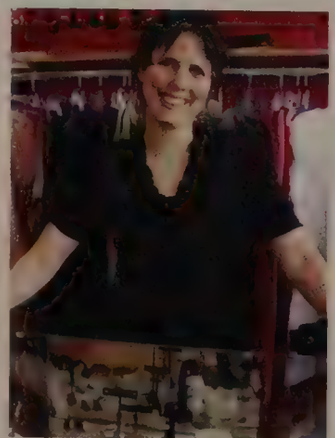
Surf and Turf



NO SELF-respecting New Orleansian seeks out a burger shack for oysters, just like no self-respecting New Englander orders a quarter-pounder in a seafood joint. Or do they? With his Neptuneburger, a bun-bound study in surf and turf, chef David Nevins shows off his considerable raw talent by breaking all the rules—and then putting them back together into a glutton's delight. The griddled round roll sandwiches not only a beefy, cheddar-cloaked burger dressed with sweet relish, but also a crowning trio of crispy, creamy bivalves slathered Louisiana-style in garlicky mayo. Even without the pile of hand-cut fries it's a mouthful. Your palate will be shell-shocked.

WHAT TRENDY ITEMS SHOULD SAVVY SHOPPERS CONSIGN AND WHAT SHOULD THEY SAVE IN 2009?

RACHAEL BANKEY OWNER OF RASPBERRY BERET IN CAMBRIDGE

Definitely sell the trends that are not working for you: the baby-doll top that makes you look pregnant, the skinny jeans that you never wear, or the dress that you still haven't found the right belt for. When selling items, it's key to sell them as soon as they're no longer working for you, but your younger sister is still loving them. Don't wait too long, or you'll have to hold onto them for 20 years when they're vintage and collectible! Trends from this year to keep: tie-neck blouses, menswear pieces and lacy dresses and shirts. Anything well-made that you feel completely comfortable in will stand the test of trends. KYLE WRIGHT

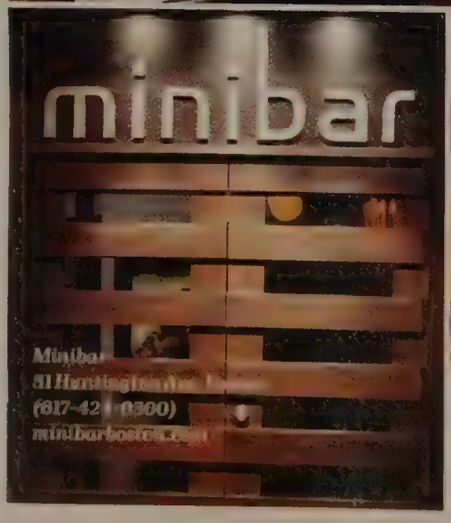
Going Out

LILLIPUTIAN LOUNGE



Despite its name, Minibar is actually adequately sized, though its aspirations aim for something larger. "We're not a restaurant; we're not a pub; we're not a club. We're in between all of that," explains general manager Tom Keefe.

Opened this December in the Copley Square Hotel, the 40-seat lobby bar casts a wide net, and the inclusive atmosphere ties into the venue's central conceit—mini-bottle service. As real minibars aren't installed in the hotel's rooms, the option gives weary travelers the ability to get liquored up without leaving the grounds. For instance, a 375ml bottle of vodka with mixers offers a fun-sized version of club luxury—one that doesn't keep you trapped in the same venue all night, forced to overindulge in order to get your money's worth. As event manager Kyla Moore puts it, "My friends will come in, and they'll do the bottle service because they can."

Though it succumbs to ultra lounge trappings, like a sleek yet stark interior and Portishead playlist, Minibar manages to skirt the label with homey touches. It's not lit like a Gregorian monastery, for one. There are coat hooks under the bar instead of a coat check by the door. And the floor-to-ceiling windows will open up in the spring, allowing customers to munch on Kobe sliders ($12) in a swank or sidewalk environment. It's an effort to transcend classifications and be all things to all people. NICK ALTSCHULLER

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

YOU CAN GO HOME AGAIN

Haunting memories of mom help a wayward soul find himself

DR. ORVILLE ROSE is ensconced in a flirtatious romp with Celestina, a yoga teacher in Italy, when he learns his mother, Selma, has died. He is lassoed back to New York State against his will by Selma's odd request: To "earn" his inheritance, Orville must live in his rejected hometown for a year and 13 days.

Along with Chagall-ish flying apparitions, Orville's mother continues to haunt her son with abrasive, accusatory letters she's arranged for him to receive periodically to remind him of his flaws. As this poor, whipped guy struggles to embrace and tolerate his hometown again, he rediscovers his childhood tormenter Henry Schooner, now a blustering, ambitious politician with "teeth that shone like ice in new Amana refrigerators." Shem paints Henry as a conflicted but successful jackass who partly wants to make amends while also bragging that Orville's mother had treated him like the beloved son she never had. Orville works with Bill, an old-timey doctor who treats the poor, dispensing a kind of voodoo-placebo he calls "Starbusol." Then, still partly connected to Celestina, he finds new love when he meets Miranda in a library.

The Spirit of the Place
By Samuel Shem

Samuel Shem is the pen name of Newton doctor Stephen Bergman, author of the novels The House of God and Mount Misery

Miranda is a modest but solid historian of Columbia County who narrates a long ribbon of its history to Orville. Being a polio survivor with one bad leg seems to add to her grit and worthiness. Their evolving romance turns childless Orville into a loved and loving father figure to Cray, Miranda's son. Paralleling the guilt-flogging of his dead mother's letters is his growing awareness that his monster-mom had also been a fervent community activist, supporting causes Orville ironically now espouses, like saving the lovely Worth Hotel. The book richly explores the complexity of family and community relationships—we're all many people in one—and the satisfying ways in which the past can be reframed and redeemed. ×××

SHOVEL THY NEIGHBOR

TO YOU IN THE SOUTH END: When I moved to your neighborhood, my friends warned me that its inhabitants were a self-important clump of wannabes, and my first winter here has affirmed that. For God's sake people, shovel out your cars when it snows! I don't understand your collective lack of respect for each other. You whine about no parking when you are the cause. I shovel after every snow, yet inevitably the drivers of every vehicle around me just spin their tires and plow out, leaving a spot where no one else can park. Come on, folks. Be nice. It'll make this winter less horrific.

I am respectful

To the graffiti artist writing in the snow on the cars parked outside my house on Phillips Street during the last week of January:

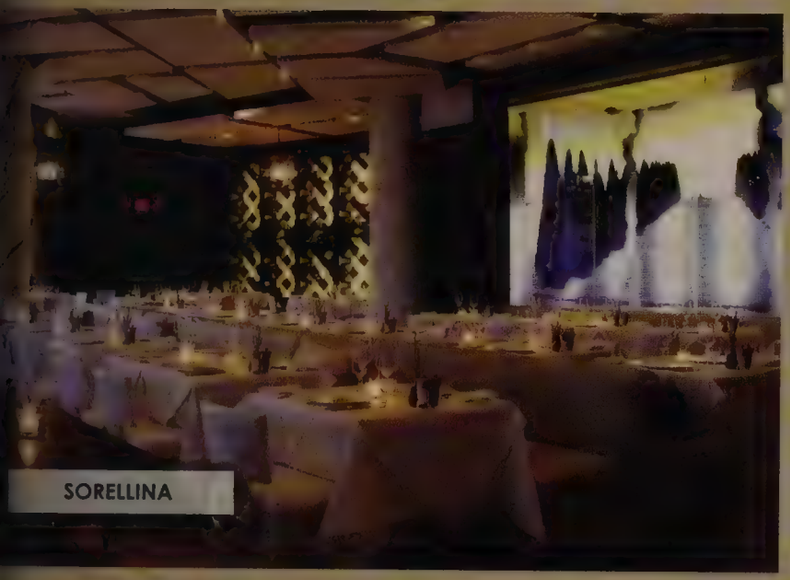
Thank you! Whether this is just plain fun or a secret message from my favorite boyishly handsome "stalker," I ♥ U2 for these little gifts that have put a big smile on my face and given a girl a bit of hope.

Happier on the Hill

Dear Allston movie enthusiast/public property defacer:

I usually do not stop to look at graffiti. When I saw your creative and, dare I say it, confusing statement on an empty wall behind Star Market in Allston the other night, however, I had to do a double take. Though your proclamation that "Toy Story 2 was OK" may be a valid opinion of the popular Disney movie, what compelled you to write such a statement in huge black letters for the world to see? I was just wondering. Whatever your intentions were, I thought they were funny.

Entertained passerby



To the rude commuter at the Arlington T stop:

Hi, it's me, the girl you backed into after people pushed you out of the way as you tried to enter the train before anyone got off. What was that you mercilessly stomped on as you walked backwards? Oh, it was just my foot. I know you were worried about my well being as you glared at me in the aftermath. But fear not, sir. As a car-less commuter, I don't need my feet to get around.

Purveyors

Herring Aid Multiple foodies and Russian ex-pats have confessed to stumbling serendipitously upon this hidden grocer. Store shelves in both the original Brookline location—a crowded nook, really—and the newer, much larger Allston market are chockablock with everything from pickled watermelon to Russian greeting cards to 80-plus varieties of Eastern European herring. Not to mention a candy selection that would make any dentist cringe. And if you can only make it to bubbie's house (or to St. Petersburg) a few times a year, a pint of silky eggplant caviar, beet vinaigrette, or chicken liver pâté will tide you over.

CLOSE CALL

The end of Excelsior and Sasso's new chef

FIRST THE POEM, then the restaurant: In Longfellow's "Excelsior," despite being warned to "beware the awful avalanche!" the unnamed stranger climbs too high and is fatally buried by the natural disaster.

As for the restaurant, Excelsior's abrupt sign-off may be just the first rumble in an avalanche of closings set off by the collapsing economy. One of the hottest restaurants in Boston when it opened in 2003, Excelsior made a splash with the spectacular food of executive chef Lydia Shire, its swanky decor, and stylish clientele—Manny Ramirez was a regular at the bar, ordering the signature lobster pizza.

Shire, who was replaced as chef by Eric Brennan in 2004 despite being a co-owner, says the space—formerly home to Biba, one of the iconic restaurants in Boston's culinary history—"meant the most to me in my life. My son grew up there, took his first steps at Biba." Now that Alex Pineda is a student at Johnson & Wales, she adds, "his ultimate goal in life is to have that space, and he'll do a kick-ass job." In the interim, the current owners plan to "re-concept" the space and open a more casual, less expensive restaurant in the fall.

MEANWHILE, GRILL 23 & BAR is rolling out a new menu of small plates that will be served weekdays from 4 to 6:30 pm. In contrast to the financial commitment of steak, items like deviled eggs with Maine crabmeat and "cheesy poofs" with jamón Serrano appeal to lighter wallets. What's not to love about "stuffed hog 'maybelle' style," a stuffed quahog that executive chef Jay Murray describes as "a really good ham sandwich," or prime-beef tataki with maple-grapefruit ponzu? It sounds like edible poetry.

WANT TO MAKE A GREAT FIRST IMPRESSION as the new chef at Sasso? If you're Anthony Mazzotta, a glance at your résumé will do it: stints at the French Laundry, Per Se, and—closer to home—EVOO and Toro. We're impressed... and now very hungry.

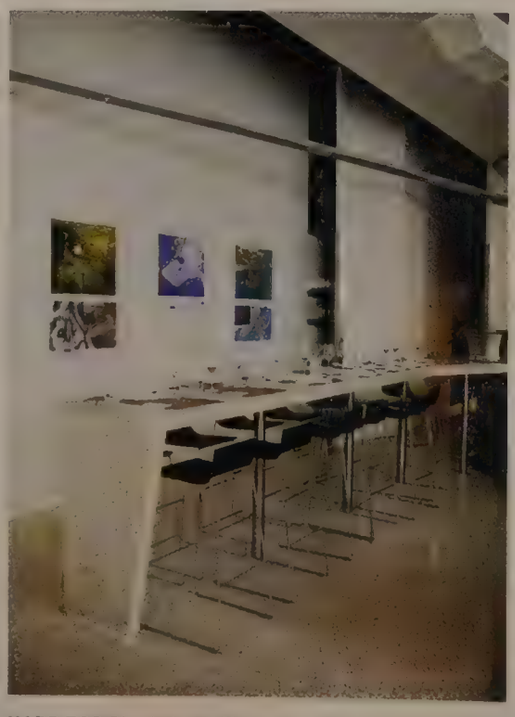
MORE, PLEASE

At Bina Osteria, good things come in small packages.

BABAK BINA AND HIS SISTER Azita Bina-Seibel have once again expanded their culinary mark on Boston. In 2006, the Italian Bin 26 Enoteca opened on Charles Street, just around the corner from their Persian Lala Rokh on Mt. Vernon Street. Now Bina Osteria and the adjoining alimentari, or food store, comprise their latest venture on Washington Street, between the Opera House and the Ritz-Carlton Hotel. Though the area, once known as the Combat Zone, is edgier than Beacon Hill, progress has been made in creating a new identity.

In their migration from the Hill, the Binas have gone thoroughly Italian. Executive chef Brian Konefal focuses primarily on producing classics that highlight fresh, well-chosen ingredients. By and large, there is no fusion, nor the confusion that often accompanies it.



On my first visit, a demitasse of lobster-chocolate consommé arrived as an amuse-bouche. Despite my skepticism, the lobster flavor was intense and enhanced by the chocolate notes, altogether making for an exquisite experience. An antipasto entitled "3 from the sea" ($13) also highlighted Bina's theme of "less is more." The trio of delicious seafood offerings—a single oyster on the half shell with citrus; a rich tuna tartare with radish, and an intriguing lumachi (periwinkle or sea snail) with a white-bean soup—constituted little more than a tease. The undersized antipasti continued with pollo e pesce ($17), a tasty combination of raw yellowfin tuna with chicken, mayonnaise, tomato confit and that most savory of condiments, capers. I'm not an advocate for the super-sized portions that have fueled the country's obesity, but somewhere there's a happy medium. Fortunately, Bina's warm rustic Italian bread, from Brookline's Clear Flour Bread, served with superb "pork butter," compensated for the sparse portions.

For a larger starter, I chose the degustazioni of cured meats ($13) from the category of contorni, or sides. Silky prosciutto from Iowa's La Quercia; thinly sliced, salt-cured bresaola, a Lombardian specialty from the foothills of the Alps; garlicky mortadella, a fatty pork sausage associated with Emilia Romagna, and coppa di testa, a remarkably tender and approachable headcheese prepared in-house, all hit the spot. Pastas were served in whole or half portions, and two of the three I tried proved excellent: spaghetti alla carbonara ($15/$27), tossed in a rich ragoût of sweet-salty-smoky pancetta, poached egg and pecorino cheese, took first prize, and a delicious ensemble of creamy parsnips, delicate veal sweetbreads and earthy, robust mushrooms in an al dente risotto ($15/$25) made it a photo finish. But the cappelli with ricotta, beets and mustard greens ($17/$25) just missed the mark.

SIZE MATTERS The pollo e pesce antipasto leaves you hungry for more.

Of the main courses, or secondi, the lobster with lardo ($31) won my vote hands down. The warm flavor of sage complemented the sweetness of the lobster, its tail wrapped in pork fat to create an impeccable texture. The slow-poached Atlantic blue cod ($26) would have scored higher had there been more of it, but the lively romesco sauce, tiny taggiasca pitted olives and fingerling potatoes that accompanied the fish were first-rate. Finally, chicken Marsala ($29) with black trumpet mushrooms and onion purée delighted as a toothsome rendering of a classic Italian dish.

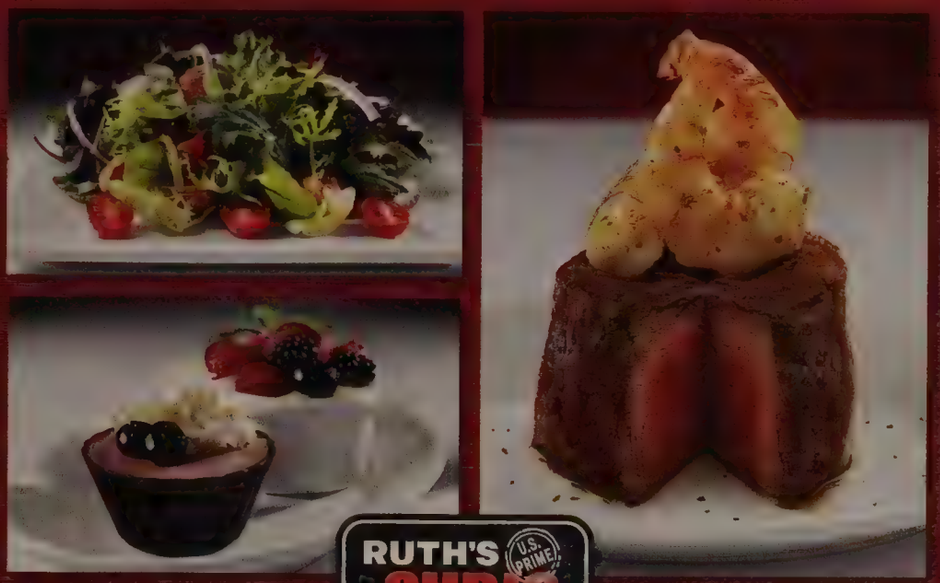
Gianduja chocolate truffle



From Bina's wine list, I chose a glass of decently structured sangiovese-merlot specially bottled for the Binas' restaurants ($7) on one night, and on another, a bottle of an elegant, minerally Cahor ($34). For dessert, the warm gianduja truffle, an intense chocolate embellished with hazelnuts, satisfied my chocoholic cravings with a refreshing scoop of hazelnut gelato as a dividend.

Bina's expansive dining room provides a striking, inviting environment. Adding to the space's attractions are high ceilings, a rectangular bar, red banquettes and an attention to professional service felt throughout my visits.

The enthusiasm radiated by Babak in his multifaceted role as host, sommelier and gastronomic evangelist is almost contagious. By building on Bina's strengths and increasing some of its portions, this restaurant can gain the traction that will make it a keeper. ✖✖✖

AM I BEING FORWARD?

A brief introduction to a book that doesn't really exist

I RECENTLY AGREED TO WRITE the introduction to an upcoming book about dirt-bike enduro racing. The fact that I know nothing at all about dirt-bike enduro racing didn't dissuade me from immediately agreeing to the project, because I figure that if I make an incorrect assertion—say, that dirt bike riders occasionally time-travel—then someone will point that out and change it anyway. Basically, then, it's just up to me to make this sport sound badass, and let someone else sort out the pesky details.

The purpose of an intro, after all, is to get people psyched up to buy the book as they're standing in a bookstore or Googling, not bore them with stupid "facts" or other "things that are true and not made-up in an alcohol-fueled orgy of hyperbole." To that end, I decided to write an introduction for my own book. Which, critics will point out, doesn't exist. But at least I've got the introduction. Read on:

Thank you for picking up this book. The fact that you are reading this sentence indicates that you are a person of impeccable good taste and keen intelligence, and I truly appreciate your taking the time to peruse this introduction. After all, you're probably currently being pursued by supermodels eager to ravish you, and it's no small risk to stop and read the beginning of a book, no matter how ridiculously awesome it might be. Unless, of course, you're reading this while being ravished by a supermodel atop your Ducati 996 motorcycle. That's just the kind of stunt you're known for, you extremely good-looking man or woman.

So, have you bought the book, then? You should. Just go to the counter and slap down the ol' Visa. Or click on "Put this in my online shopping cart, which will help detract attention from the fact that all my other items are pornographic." You won't regret it. A handsome specimen like yourself, with so much going for you, really the only thing you need to round out your perfect life is a nice, new book.

Maybe you're in a library, or you got this book from a library. Well, um, that's good. As long as you're not afraid of flesh-eating bacteria. Do you know how many people read an average library book? Well, me neither. But I do know that when borrow something from a library, I mark my pages with boogers. Just kidding. I don't do that. But I have a friend who does, so you should never borrow a book from a friend, either. You should buy your own. That way you have the knowledge that the item in your hands has never been brought into a public library bathroom by a hobo. Because studies show that 86 percent of library books have been brought into the bathroom by hobos.

Since we've established that you want this book as your own, allow me to affirm your good judgment. Because this book is intended to shatter all expectations. Soon enough, the top 10 New York Times best sellers will be this book, plus nine translations. Oprah will devote several weeks to reading this book aloud on-air. It will become a standard part of college curricula, even the basis for football playbooks. It'll be the most popular book in human history. (Of course, with one very obvious exception, a book that's changed the lives of millions of people over the years: Bo Knows Bo, by Bo Jackson.)

That's because, prior to writing, I went to the bookstore to discern what's hot. I want to write what you want to read, and so I compiled a list of the most popular types of books. They are:

-Books with a commanding title followed by a lengthy subtitle.

-Books about dogs, featuring a dog on the cover.

-Books by Malcolm Gladwell.

So the ideal book, from a popularity perspective, would be Dogs and Me: How Our Canine Companions Are Really Cute but Ultimately a Sad Reminder That Someday We Will Die, by Malcolm Gladwell.

Unfortunately, there were a few snags with this project. First, the pen name "Malcolm Gladwell" is in use by another author, a fellow who uses it in lieu of his somewhat lesser-known legal name, "Fonzie Skrotum." Mr. Skrotum's lawyers have indicated that he is loath to share his pen name, or even one that's merely similar, such as "Markolm Galdwell."

Also, in my initial drafts, I had a hard time articulating the symbolic implications, the sometimes unsettling gravitas of the human-canine relationship. In search of a story of love and life with an irascible four-legged companion, I went to a dog park and struck up a conversation with a man who was walking a five-month-old Lab-German shepherd mutt named Bubba. I asked the man how he liked his dog, hoping for a lively tale of mischievous hijinks. He replied, "We got this dog thinking he was a Lab, but now you can see the German shepherd coming out—see, his ears stand up straight? I hope he's a good dog, because my cousin's got a shepherd, and that thing eats its own crap. No joke. She sees him take a dump and goes outside to pick it up, but it's already gone. 'Cause he ate it." Great story, sure, but not the stuff of a blockbuster best seller with future movie rights. "Bubba the Recycling German Shepherd" could have a positive message for a children's book, though.

With that, I abandoned my plan to write a book about dogs. Instead, I opted to delve into another lucrative genre, the memoir. If you doubt the power of a good memoir, consider the author Barack Obama, whose memoir Dreams From My Father was so well received that he was elected president of the United States. In Obama's book, you can read how his father was Kenyan and not around. In my book, you can read how my father was not Kenyan, but my mother keeps all her important paperwork in a large fish tank. I don't want to say that Obama and I have identical life stories, but I wouldn't be surprised if I am also elected president.

While I endeavor to recount tales from my formative years—including my parents' use of wildly inappropriate language in mixed company, and the reasons you should zigzag when someone holding a BB gun tells you to start running—I must stress that none of this is madcap and/or zany. There are certain comic elements pertaining to, say, the time I got arrested and joshed with the prison check-in clerk about being suicidal, but none of that should be construed as "humor." I say this because I don't want this book to end up in the humor section of the bookstore, wedged between a Dilbert compilation and You Might Be a Redneck if... You've Ever Molested a Lost Tourist! So if you finish this book and tell all your friends that it wasn't that funny—thanks. You are doing me an immeasurable favor.

So now that we've established that you're not only getting your money's worth, but that you'll be culturally ignorant if you don't own this book, please move along to the counter and pay up. This isn't a library. Unless it is, in which case, you should probably go wash your hands. ✖✖✖

BEING A BETTER MAN

On the unending quest for self-improvement

A sinking feeling

I WAS SHAVING AFTER a health club workout last week. The hot water was running and another member, an architect, came up to chat. "Hey," he said. "Don't let the water run while you shave. Turn it on and off; saves water." Then he talked at me as I finished, as I tried to do the right thing. Finally I finished. "Do me a favor," I said.

"What?" he asked.

"Don't follow me into the shower."

People have always pointed things out to make me a better person or to improve the planet. But it's really because society is uncomfortable with nonconformity, even in small things.

For instance, I can't stand mushrooms, and everyone I know seems to love them. My idea of another circle of hell happened several years ago. My wife and I were invited to a dinner at a private club. It was billed to us as a special menu, a gourmet's delight. I'm always suspicious of "special dinners," unless it's eight kinds of pasta with no mushrooms in anything. We arrived at the black-tie evening, and our hostess ran up to us and gushed, "Surprise! Did I give you the news? It's an all-mushroom dinner—even dessert with fungi-shaped meringues to die for."

"I will die," I told her. "I'm allergic to mushrooms." The little lies we tell. It's much easier to say, "I'm allergic," than to say, "I hate mushrooms." If you're curious, I had chopped salad and a chicken breast for dinner. "I'm so sorry," our hostess said. "What happens to you if you eat mushrooms?"

Society is uncomfortable with noncomformity.

"Every part of me," I answered, "swells to gigantic size."

My wife has pointed out various life-enhancing habits to me, and, it seems, she finds new stuff every month. Lately, she's taught me how to put tumblers efficiently into the dishwasher and to pack a suitcase properly, dirty clothes on the bottom. Geez. How I lived this long without knowing any of these things is astounding.

Lots of times in marriage, a spouse gives a look that says, "You idiot." But it's an unspoken look—unless things are starting to unravel. In that case, anything goes.

When I was in the army, people were always telling me how to do things. In basic training, we had a number of recruits from Puerto Rico who came north thinking that they'd be murdered in their beds, so they all slept with bayonets under their pillows. Several of the Puerto Rican boys took me under their wing after watching me march in various incorrect directions. "You can't make the bunk right, we don't pass inspection. We don't get pass for weekend. No brasso, no passo," they said. So they'd insist on helping with my bunk and polishing my brass. This was great for me, and they'd shake their heads as I tried to make my belt buckle shine. "We think you should sleep with a bayonet under your pillow, too," they said. I took this as a compliment.

Even my office partners are always trying to shape me up. "Bluetooth," they tell me. "You're on the phone all the time; it'll help your neck, your spine, everything."

"I don't like things stuck in my ear; it's a violation of my ear," I tell them.

"Some people have to be pulled, kicking and screaming, into the 21st century," they answer.

I think I have plenty of reasons to be kicking and screaming. ✖✖✖

ON A-ROID, YOUK AND RONDO'S HAPPY B'DAY

3 Practice Drills for Doc

House Arrest... Every other practice, put Big Baby and Kevin Garnett on Offensive Paint Arrest. They're each fixed with an electronic ankle bracelet, and any shot taken from outside the paint is accompanied by 600 volts. A great idea, although KG might actually welcome the pain.

The Crooked Ref... Each week, invite a ref down to officiate the end-of-practice scrimmage, but unbeknownst to the team, this guy's only job is to make bad calls, mouth off and do anything in his power to antagonize Kendrick Perkins. If Perk draws a T, he has to room with Tony Allen and Sam Cassell on the next road trip.

The Whopper Shot... Gabe Pruitt ends every practice by shooting 20 three-pointers. For every miss, he has to down a Whopper. We love Pruitt's game, but his body's frail enough to excite Michael Jackson.

2 FOR THE A-ROID SCANDAL

Why we won't taunt A-Rod The other 103 names. You really think the Sox will be spared? Taunting A-Rod about steroids is like standing in front of a firing squad and laughing after the guy next to you gets shot.

Ixnay on the endship-fray The one guy who's suffered the most throughout this whole ordeal is Andy Pettitte. Can you imagine his awkward discomfort as A-Rod told Peter Gammons (and the world) that Pettitte was "like a brother" and "one of his best friends on the team"? Um, Alex. Maybe you can just not tell anyone else about that.

TOP 5 NBA TEAMS AT THE BREAK

5. Denver Nuggets It's been a joy to once again watch Chauncey Billups without having to fight off that not-so-fresh feeling. But if we're being honest, the Nuggets are only here because someone has to be No. 5. They'll make it past the first round, but their title chances are slimmer than Tayshaun Prince.

4. San Antonio Spurs They could be higher, but our unbridled hatred of Manu Ginobili won't let that happen. The biggest question with San Antonio isn't whether a team that starts Matt Bonner at center can be taken seriously. It's more: Did anyone get a urine sample from Bonner after that last game at the Garden?

3. Cleveland Cavaliers The Cavs/Celtics argument comes down to home-court advantage, and as long as Boston has it, Cleveland plays the third wheel. That is, until next year when LeBron wins his first of at least five straight titles. Every game takes us closer to NBA Armageddon, starring No. 23 as the sweet-talking, sharply-dressed asteroid.

2. Boston Celtics It's time for our daily Celtics affirmation (now Danny, say it with us): "We're good enough, we're smart enough, but gosh darn it, if we don't get Joe Smith in here, heads are gonna roll!" (Note: If the Cavs deal for Marcus Camby, add five exclamation points to affirmation and/or commence heavy drinking.)

1. Los Angeles Lakers Sure, Kobe's an arrogant fool, Pau Gasol looks like a Fraggle and Sasha Vujacic has the kind of face you'd just love to stomp on, but unless you spend your days eating peyote with John Hollinger, you'd be hard-pressed to make a sound argument against L.A. being the team of the first half.

4 DATES TO WATCH

2/19 The Celtics kick off the second half of the season in Utah, where the Jazz will be unveiling a new ticket promotion: Bring one wife to the game and your second wife gets in at half price.

2/22 Happy 23rd birthday to Take Five–favorite, Rajon Rondo! There are only four starting point guards in the NBA who are younger than Rajon, but thus far he's the only one to threaten us with a restraining order. Guess that's the last time we go "bird-watching" in his backyard.

2/25 The Red Sox play their first Spring Training game of the season, but it won't be the same without Terry Francona wondering: "Crap, who's gonna play left field until Manny decides to show up?"

2/26 The Bruins host Anaheim, and while the Mighty Ducks are only barely over .500 on the season, they've been playing much better since wrestling smooth-skating (albeit slightly spoiled) Adam Banks away from the Hawks.

1 ONE MORE CRAZY YEAR FOR YOUK

Is he a power hitter or a table-setter? A first baseman or a third baseman? With no offensive replacement for Manny in sight and Mike Lowell's health still in question, 2009 will be another schizophrenic season for Kevin Youkilis. Thankfully, he's proven he can handle his dual identities better than Christian Slater.

Soroff On DAN AYKROYD

The comedy master on the blues, his days at Saturday Night Live and the paranormal

AN ORIGINAL CAST MEMBER OF SATURDAY NIGHT LIVE and half of the infamous comedy duo the Blues Brothers, Dan Aykroyd is a partner in the House of Blues, which reopens in Boston on Lansdowne Street on Feb. 19. Born and raised in Canada, Aykroyd dropped out of Carleton University to hone his chops as an entertainer, eventually joining Chicago's Second City comedy troupe. From 1975 to 1979, his notoriety grew as he impersonated Richard Nixon, Jimmy Carter and others on SNL, eventually winning an Emmy for his work on the show. His dramatic acting earned him an Oscar nomination for Driving Miss Daisy and box office success with hits like Trading Places and Ghostbusters. He recently launched a wine label and a premium vodka brand, and he is a member of the Order of Canada. He lives in Ontario with his wife, actress Donna Dixon, and their three daughters.

Jonathan Soroff: If I can ask you to be a wiseass...
Dan Aykroyd: I'm not built that way. I'm a Canadian. I have way too much respect for [blues artists and the music in general] to speak disparagingly of people I've worked with. For instance, in the Blues Brothers, we had Aretha Franklin, Ray Charles.... But fire away. I'm just a hay farmer from Canada.

Who's on heavy rotation on your iPod?
I like this lady Roxanne Potvin. Incredible artist. Great guitarist. Has a great look. She's one of the torchbearers for the next generation. I like all the female blues singers right now: Susan Tedeschi, Rory Block, Bonnie Raitt. I'd love to bring an all-women blues review to the House of Blues and have, like, six of them up there.

Best live act you ever saw?
I'd say James Brown. I'd love to take Rockin' Dopsie—he's a zydeco guy who plays the accordion—with Sharon Jones and the Dap Kings and the James Brown Orchestra. That's a killer show.

How about the resurgence of the singer/songwriter/troubadour type?
There's the old song: "The Blues Had a Baby, and They Called It Rock 'n' Roll." It's definitely true. We're going back to great R&B sounds with artists like Sharon Jones and the Sap Kings, Amy Winehouse. It's really evocative of the Stax/Volk era, which, I think, is the greatest era in American music.

Ever been to Clarksdale, Miss.?
I have been to the crossroads. I was lookin' for that spot where "he knelt down and sold his soul to the devil," because I've gotta talk to the devil about getting my soul back. Maybe he'll make a deal.

Let's go back to your SNL days. Was that the hardest job you ever had?
It was difficult. We had fun, but it was very stressful. We were video commandos. We were like little bulls in a bullpen, and they'd free us the way they do at a rodeo: Let us do our thing, then put us back in the pen, feed and water us, and get us ready for the next thing.

Do you miss it?
It was gratifying, because you came up with an idea on Monday. By Tuesday, you were writing it. By Wednesday, you were figuring out how to build the set and the other logistics. Thursday you were blocking it. Friday you were refining it. And by Saturday it was on the air. So from inception to execution, it was a very short period.

Do you still watch?
As often as I can. It's like watching your old basketball or football team, as an alumnus. I love it. The new cast is fantastic, and I actually go to shows sometimes. I sit with Lorne [Michaels] under the scaffolding.

Julia Child once told me she thought your impression of her was hilarious. Has anyone else ever said that?
[Laughs.] No. I usually avoid people I imitate.

Funniest person you've ever known?
That's tough. My brother comes pretty close. But I guess I'd have to say Duncan Leighton, a guy I went to college with. A master wit of the century.

Is comedy unfairly overlooked by the Academy?
Umm, if there was a category created, it would be easy to fill it every year, and that's probably what would be required—a special recognition of best comedy screenplay, picture and performance. But the Oscars are already too long.

Favorite movie of yours?
I kind of like that film I did with John Cusack, Grosse Pointe Blank. That one always pops up.

How about Ghostbusters*—do you believe in ghosts?*
I do. Although I've never seen a full-torso apparition, I've seen enough and read enough. Just Google up the ghost of Raynham Hall. That's a genuine photo of a spirit. My whole family is very into spiritualism. My brother has done a lot of research into the paranormal.

So are you psychic?
No. Not a psychic bone in my body, although everyone is psychic to a certain extent—like having dreams and premonitions or telepathic interchanges with other human beings. Everyone has that. With work, you can open up that eye a little more. David Blaine has done a lot of work, and he really does levitate. I only have what all of us have, like finishing someone's sentence, or knowing beforehand what they're going to say.

As a teen, you wanted to become a priest?
I loved the ritual, the robes, the gold, the chalices, the material possessions of the church. The black Olds 88 the priest rode around in, the broad burgundy sash, burgundy yarmulke and the black cross he wore. And the thought of maybe someday getting into the Vatican bank.

Your favorite show-biz souvenir?
A fully-decked, logo'd and marked Illinois State Police car from the Blues Brothers. Fake Illinois plates, red lights, whip aerials, spotlights. I drove that thing around New York City for about four years.

Last question: Will you pay my bar tab opening night at the House of Blues?
You're absolutely covered. ✖✖✖

Hell of a Time

The Devil Is in the Details

Some artists paint, some sculpt and some draw. Others shake their groove thang. Choreographers Zoe Scofield and Juniper Shuey blend dance with video and photography to dazzle audiences with innovative spectacles. Their latest, The Devil You Know Is Better Than the Devil You Don't, examines the difference between order and chaos. Unfortunately, "Disco Inferno" is not on the set list. The show is at the ICA on Feb. 20 and 21.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

Bride Wars ★ ½ Finally, a chick flick for people who hate women. This misogynist, painfully unfunny farce stars Kate Hudson and Anne Hathaway as lifelong best friends who find their weddings accidentally scheduled on the same day. In the world of director Gary Winick, such a misunderstanding instantly transforms the ladies into raging monsters who trash their friendship for a spate of mean-spirited, sitcom-like sabotage attempts. Meanwhile, the families sit idly on the sidelines, though any injection of common sense or compromise would resolve everything instantly. Director Winick's previous work includes the equally ugly Tadpole, about a young teen who falls for his stepmother. It's all enough to make you wonder about Winick's sense of healthy dispositions. Are we supposed to believe that characters could really be so craven, materialistic and cruel? And if so, why would we want to watch a movie about them? (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Coraline ★★★ Neil Gaiman's psychologically spiky novella gets a fairly faithful rendering from gifted stop-motion animator Henry Selick, who previously tickled eyeballs with his beloved The Nightmare Before Christmas and the terrific but underrated James and the Giant Peach. Voiced without much gusto by Dakota Fanning, our title lass is a neglected only child who happens upon a secret tunnel leading to an alternate universe where doppelgängers of her distracted parents are suddenly affectionate and doting. Of course, they do have buttons for eyes, but that's probably the least creepy thing about them. A psychedelic trip down a dark rabbit hole of youthful anxieties, Coraline is never less than a visual marvel, even when Gaiman's leaps of dream-logic become more head-scratching than mind-blowing. If you have the option, I'd check out the 3-D version, which wisely foregoes the usual gimmicky gotcha effects and instead uses the wondrous Real D technology to further envelop you in Selick's richly detailed, carefully rendered world. Also, it's nice to see a heroic cat, for a change. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Curious Case of Benjamin Button ★★ David Fincher, the gifted and sardonic director of Fight Club and Zodiac, goes Forrest Gump in this shockingly syrupy take on an old F. Scott Fitzgerald short story. Borrowing the premise and little else from the original work, Button stars Brad Pitt as a quizzical fellow born as a elderly man who ages backwards as the film grinds on. And on. Some gorgeous, state-of-the-art digital effects have been invented to place Pitt's face on all sorts of incongruous bodies, but besides existing as a technical marvel, there's little point to the proceedings. Screenwriter Eric Roth seems to have recycled his Forrest Gump script, changing a few names but keeping the central notion of a bumpkin in a doomed romance naively wandering through blunt historical signposts with a surfeit of cornpone aphorisms. There's no actual conflict as we wait for Pitt to grow young and die, just a lot of pretty pictures, plus the visceral nagging disappointment that a talent as subversive as Fincher's stooped to helming shiny Hollywood sap. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Defiance ★★ Director Edward Zwick, perpetrator of such prestigious snores as Blood Diamond and The Last Samurai, has an uncanny knack for sucking all the excitement out of fascinating real-life stories. Zwick strikes again with Defiance, a stodgy, lugubrious account of the Bielski brothers, who escaped from the Nazi occupation into the Belarusian forest, where they built a makeshift village, teamed up with Russian resistance fighters and protected hundreds from the Holocaust. Daniel Craig stars as Tuvia, who humorlessly assumes command of the refugee camp after his reckless brother Zus (Liev Schreiber) heads out to fight with the Russians. Billy Elliot's Jamie Bell plays another sibling, and there's even an ill-conceived love story tossed in for good measure. In typical Zwick fashion, the over-scaled, curiously bloodless action sequences lack any sense of urgency, and the details of a compelling tale are smothered in Hollywood cheese. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Doubt ★★★ Sometimes subtlety is overrated. Just ask Meryl Streep, who smacks her lips and carves ham as the ferocious Sister Aloysius in John Patrick Shanley's big-screen adaptation of his Pulitzer Prize–winning play. In a Bronx Catholic School circa 1964, Streep's nasty, uptight nun stares

The International
★★½
Starring Clive Owen, Naomi Watts, Armin Mueller-Stahl, Ulrich Thomsen and Brian O'Byrne. Written by Eric Singer. Directed by Tom Tykwer. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

TIMING IS EVERYTHING, so what's better suited for this tumultuous economic age than a jittery, paranoid thriller in which the big, bad villain turns out to be a bank?

Tom Tykwer's The International is an expertly crafted work of ridiculous hokum. It's goofy as all get out and suffers from broad missteps that typically befall European art-film directors whenever they attempt a Hollywood genre product.

The German Tykwer is a fascinating fellow who's undeniably skilled and more than a little crazy. It makes sense to hire him for a big-budget action flick, because in films both overrated (Run Lola Run) and underrated (The Princess and the Warrior), he's always showboating his knack for kinetic energy.

But right from the start, The International exhibits a weird tone deafness, with performances of various shapes and sizes bumping up against one another uncomfortably, as if nobody's quite sure how seriously they're supposed to be taking all the nonsense.

The one man taking it extremely seriously is a disheveled, furious Clive Owen, here working his smoldering mojo as disgruntled Interpol agent Lou Salinger. In standard cop-on-the-edge fashion, Lou's wrecked his personal life and trashed his career, all in pursuit of the rather disappointingly named International Bank of Business and Credit. He knows in his gut that the IBBC is up to no good, but every time he comes close to cracking a case, his witnesses end up dying in freak accidents, and poor Lou always finds himself demoted.

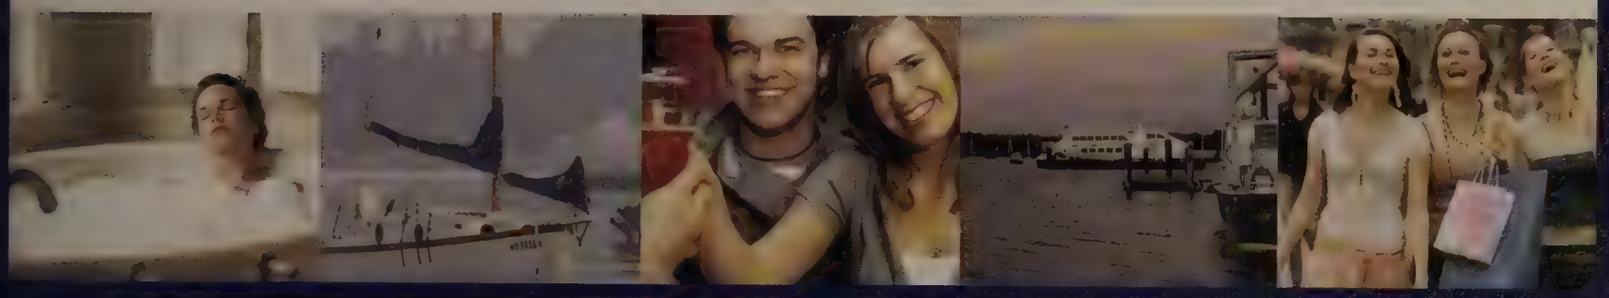
This bank, we're told, has connections everywhere, at every level of government in every country. Engaged in a giant conspiracy, the IBBC effortlessly alters official police statements and autopsy reports, and it even has its own hitman, known only as "the Consultant" (an eerie Brian O'Byrne), to take care of all their pesky political assassination needs.

But there's a nagging question left in first-timer Eric Singer's screenplay: Why would a monolithic, all-powerful organization allow itself to be hamstrung arranging petty arms deals with Third World dictators? Apparently the IBBC is so leveraged at this particular moment that the only thing that can save it from bankruptcy is a single, stress-filled missile swap. (Sadly, Singer missed a prime opportunity to explain this scenario by blaming it all on crap mortgages.)

I'm tempted to say it's the best movie shoot-out since Heat.

Working, rather inexplicably, with Naomi Watts' New York district attorney, Owen's unshaven attack dog seizes the moment and attempts to take the bank down once and for all, inspiring a number of complicated action scenes so exquisitely helmed by Tykwer, you'll desperately want to forgive the rest of the movie for being so unintentionally funny and lacking in common sense.

Watts is just awful here, reduced to spouting exposition in her clanging, unconvincing American accent. But Owen commits to the unworthy material one thousand percent as he sweats, seethes and glowers into the camera. Tykwer, bless his crazy heart, still loves to muster up a mood by setting epic staring contests to throbbing, hypnotic synth-pop.



The International's jaw-dropping centerpiece is a 14-minute, cat-and-mouse surveillance effort in New York City's Guggenheim Museum. Stealthily snaking up the Manhattan landmark's spiral rotunda, Lou stalks the elusive Consultant, and every reflective surface and video-art installation becomes fodder for visual mischief as Tykwer abandons dialogue altogether and allows cinematographer Frank Griebe's camera to work around corners and into privileged positions. It's a sinewy, voyeuristic set piece worthy of a young Brian De Palma.

Then everybody breaks out machine guns.

It's easy to slip into hyperbole when trying to explain a gonzo action sequence executed with the full-tilt precision and exquisite attention to craftsmanship Tykwer demonstrates here. Personally, I'm tempted to say it's the best movie shootout since Michael Mann turned downtown L.A. into a war zone halfway through Heat. (And just between us, a certain esteemed critic from a local daily leapt to his feet when the bullets finally stopped, giving the scene a standing ovation.)

The great filmmaker Howard Hawks once famously said that the key to making a good movie was "three good scenes and no bad ones." The International has a bunch of bad scenes, but one is downright amazing. ✖✖✖ daggers at Philip Seymour Hoffman's progressive, freewheeling Father Flynn. But when Flynn's potentially inappropriate relationship with the school's first black student is called into question, we're in for some grand Inside the Actor's Studio explosions. Shanley's meaty moral questionnaire explores the gulf between tradition and modernity in the heightened form of a parable, with Amy Adams' meek Sister James torn between our protagonists. Shanley hasn't directed since 1990's tragically underrated Joe Versus the Volcano, and while his visuals are fairly perfunctory, he's at least wise enough to embrace his own material's inherent staginess, highlighting the broad theatricality of these performances. You'll never forget you're watching a filmed play, but with a cast like this, who can complain? (In the suburbs.)

Frost/Nixon ★★ ½ In refashioning Peter Morgan's smash 2006 play for the big screen, director Ron Howard made a wise move casting original stars Michael Sheen and Frank Langella. This picture has a ton of problems, but at the very least, Sheen's sly performance as seemingly callow chat-show host David Frost and Langella's towering Tricky Dick have been preserved on film for posterity. Morgan's play positioned Frost's 1977 televised interviews with Nixon as a David and Goliath battle, a belated national catharsis in which the wily interrogator tripped the disgraced former president into something close to a mea culpa. Where Howard errs is exactly where this terminally dull filmmaker always errs: He treats his audience like imbeciles. We've got all the makings of a brilliant psychodrama playing out in the loaded glares and strategic statements of Sheen and Langella, yet Howard constantly cuts away to a fake documentary format with a peanut gallery of bit players staring straight into the lens and helpfully explaining everything we've just seen. Thanks, Opie. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Gran Torino ★★★ ½ A throwback to Clint Eastwood's cheap and dirty '80s crowd-pleasers, Gran Torino looks like it was shot over the course of a long weekend and cost about $15 to make. It's also extremely entertaining. Eastwood plays a growling, bigoted Korean War vet who gradually warms to a family of Hmong immigrants living next door. As he sputters, spits and cusses his way through scenes, this mean, old dog learns a few new tricks. The movie is pitched at the same hyperbolic level as Eastwood's oversized turn. Designed as his farewell to acting, the movie plays like catnip for longtime fans. There's a valedictory air to the work, studded with explicit references to characters like Harry Callahan, Gunny Highway and Josey Wales. Like his other films, Gran Torino has some satisfying shades of moral uncertainty lurking beneath the surface. But viewers will also get a giddy thrill of seeing a 78-year-old badass pulling a gun on gangbangers and snarling, "Get off my lawn." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

He's Just Not That Into You ★★ ½ Unexpectedly tough-minded and insightful for a fair stretch of its running time, director Ken Kwapis' adaptation of Greg Behrendt and Liz Tuccillo's best-selling self-help book starts out with both feet planted firmly on the ground instead of head over heels. The film takes a dim view of the dating scene, as Ginnifer Goodwin's high-strung serial clinger learns some hard lessons from Justin Long's bartender lothario. There's a surprisingly eccentric turn from Jennifer Connelly as a suspicious housewife whose hubby (Bradley Cooper) is enjoying too many late-night yoga lessons with Scarlett Johansson. Even Ben Affleck and Jennifer Aniston are decent for a change, playing a long-term couple wondering what it really means to be married. How infuriating then to watch the last half hour undercut the previous 90 minutes of bitter truths. Shoehorning these characters into one sappy Hollywood ending after another and selling itself short for chick-flick clichés, He's Just Not That Into You cops out and decides that he really is. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Last Chance Harvey ★★★ Unlike Pacino or DeNiro, who keep tarnishing their legacies by trying to headline crummy thrillers, Dustin Hoffman has aged gracefully, settling into quirky supporting roles in offbeat projects. It's a rare pleasure to watch Hoffman take the lead in Joel Hopkins' wispy, AARP riff on Richard Linklater's Before Sunrise. Arriving in London for the wedding of a daughter who'd rather he'd just stayed home, Hoffman's Harvey finds himself wandering the city all night with Emma Thompson's sad-eyed spinster, and the two connect on that chatty, instantly magical level that's probably only possible in the movies. Twee around the margins, Hopkins keeps trying to cram in multicultural kookiness better suited for a Jonathan Demme flick. But the movie works in spite of such missteps, simply because Hoffman and Thompson are so enjoyable to watch. There's a contagious delight these two wonderful performers create by riffing off one another, and even if the movie isn't much, it's a treat spending time with them. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Milk ★★★ ½ Playing the title role in Gus Van Sant's rousing, surprisingly accessible biography of slain civil-rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years: He smiles. Oscar-season biopics often feel like homework, but Van Sant charts Milk's rise to prominence as the first openly gay man elected to public office as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead, who clearly hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High. Eight years ago, this gifted director turned his back on Hollywood, devoting himself to abstract, lyrical films like Gerry, Last Days, and his recent Paranoid Park. In such difficult company, Milk feels startlingly conventional. It's crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining, yet crafted with savvy visual intelligence by Van Sant and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides. Like the inclusive American ideals Milk so boisterously advocated, the movie is open to everybody. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Pink Panther 2 ★ ½ Steve Martin's recent memoir, Born Standing Up, was one of the sharpest and most insightful books ever written about the art of comedy. So it's anything but funny to see that Martin's follow-up act is a coscreenplay credit on this moldering pile of worn-out gags and goofy accent jokes. Martin once again makes a mockery of Peter Sellers' iconic Inspector Clouseau, substituting the precise slapstick of those early Blake Edwards films with stumblebum pratfalls and an untoward amount of shouting. The convoluted caper finds Clouseau assigned to a "dream team" of international detectives, which unfortunately means we're stuck watching Andy Garcia, Alfred Molina and Yuki Matsuzaki play up some seriously tacky ethnic stereotypes. Martin's Inspector is inconsistent from scene to scene. His competency varies according to the needs of the plot, and an ill-advised subplot in which he's required to take political correctness from Lily Tomlin steals shamelessly from Borat. Martin should be ashamed. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (In the suburbs.)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director

Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy-tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in suburbs.)

Taken ★★ ½ Here's another slick, lurid thriller from writer/producer Luc Besson in which the French director employs his trademark blend of brutal action sequences and mawkish sentimentality. It's a tricky mix that Besson got just right in 1994's The Professional, but he's found diminishing returns ever since. Liam Neeson stars as a retired CIA assassin turned overprotective dad. He blanches at his precious teenage daughter's wishes to follow U2 across Europe, and it turns out father really does knows best, because young Kim (Maggie Grace) has barely stepped off the plane in Paris when she's kidnapped by snarling Albanian sex traffickers. What follows is a brisk procession of ass-whoopings, with towering, tree-trunk Neeson snapping limbs and tossing corpses all along the Seine. It's completely preposterous and more than a little stupid, but director Pierre Morel knows his way around a fight sequence, and his burly leading man injects a surprising gravitas to a one-note, Jack Bauer knockoff. Neeson's early monologue, threatening his daughter's kidnappers, is itself almost worth the price of admission. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Valkyrie ★★ ½ Tom Cruise is now more famous for bizarre behavior than blockbusters, so in desperate need of career rehab, he tries to kill Hitler. Cruise stars as Colonel Claus von Stauffenberg, a Nazi with a conscience, whose suitcase bombing nearly took out der Führer in WWII's waning days. It's a handsomely mounted production directed with brisk efficiency by Bryan Singer, and as a pal surmised, "It will probably be wicked suspenseful for anybody who didn't pay attention in history class." Short on characterization and long on Hitchockian set pieces, Valkyrie is leaner than your typical WWII drama. Normally this might be a refreshing change of pace, but absent a compelling point of view, the movie is too focused on the nuts and bolts of an assassination attempt that we already know was a failure. It's hard to get yourself invested. Cruise remains tediously noble, and despite the period trappings, it's not really so different from one of his Mission: Impossible movies. (In the suburbs.)

Waltz With Bashir ★★ ½ Sifting through long-buried memories of Israel's 1982 Lebanon war, Ari Folman's autobiographical documentary tells a story from so many standpoints and with such lack of affect that the movie remains elusive. The animation style is both striking and off-putting. It resembles the rotoscoping used in Waking Life and Chicago 10, but Waltz was created with a mix of Flash, 3-D and traditional animation techniques, so certain scenes look more like a Web site than a movie. Some events are dramatized while others are simply recited straight into the camera. The surreal combat scenes are memorable and harrowing, but Folman's use of repressed memory syndrome as a cliffhanger device feels phony and cheapens the material with Hollywood conventions. The aloof, distant quality of the film gnaws at you, and not even a final flourish of sickening, real-life photography can bridge the gap. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

The Wrestler ★★★★ The movie is shrewd enough to use Mickey Rourke's decimated visage to its advantage. Hell, it's practically a monument to his personal ruin. Rourke's washed-up wrestler, Randy "The Ram," is a teetering wreck who doesn't stand a chance of recapturing his former glory, and every close-up hammers that point home. Faced with a health crisis, he makes a few efforts. He reaches out to a sympathetic stripper (well played by Marisa Tomei) who similarly finds herself growing too old for her profession. He briefly attempts to reconnect with his estranged daughter (Evan Rachel Wood), but all the damage he inflicted in the past can't be easily undone. The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions, it simply asks that we spend a little time with these people and live inside their world for a spell. Here, at last, is a true sequel to the original Rocky, full of quiet desperation, squalid backdrops and earthy humor. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square, Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

ANOTHER WORLD

Antony Hegarty gives voice to our earthly sadness and joy

Chico De Luigi

ANTONY HEGARTY casts a towering presence, full in frame and delicate in details. So perhaps it's not surprising that when someone raises the subject of reincarnation, the singer/pianist shares his keen interest in trees.

"It must ache to be always inside that bark, slowly growing so painfully," says the 6' 2" Hegarty, who embraces the natural world on The Crying Light, his sublime new disc from his chamber-cabaret group, Antony and the Johnsons. "Yet everybody walks by a tree and says, 'It's so beautiful!'"

People have this expectation where life is always supposed to be happier and it's not really supposed to hurt. Life does hurt. That's part of being alive. It aches, like a sweet ache and sometimes a terrible ache, in the heart and in the chest. And it's probably the same for every single living thing."

Hegarty, 37, shares that ache in every tremulous cry and sigh from his transcendent voice, which suggests a cross between Bryan Ferry and Nina Simone. He has mesmerized new listeners with his riveting turn in the Leonard Cohen tribute concert film I'm Your Man and his guest vocals with Hercules and Love Affair, Björk and Lou Reed.

He becomes even more intimate and emotive when he fronts Antony and the Johnsons, who play at the Berklee Performance Center on Feb. 22. Few pop vocalists since Jeff Buckley have struck such a vulnerable chord.

"What people respond to is the spirit inside the voice—that was just me for years and years, writing songs and getting closer to my own story," says the English-born Hegarty. "I wasn't born like this. I have a report card from the 2nd grade that said, 'He likes music a lot. If only his prowess matched his enthusiasm.'"

His family moved to the Netherlands and then California, where Hegarty settled at age 12, a transgender kid drawn to pop singers Boy George, Alison Moyet and the Cocteau Twins' Liz Fraser, then to soul influences Simone and Donny Hathaway.

Singing offered "a way to express the things I wasn't allowed to express in my real life," Hegarty says from his Manhattan home. "Music—pop music especially—was the place I saw people musically and visually expressing themselves in a more abundant and expansive way."

After studying experimental theater at NYU, he expanded his horizons in Blacklips, an early '90s performance collective that staged outrageous late-night musicals at the East Village's Pyramid Club. Hegarty was known to sing at night's end while dressed as God or Charles Manson.

His breakthrough came when he stripped back the drag-queen theatrics to record his original, piano-based songs with the Johnsons. Their second outing, I Am a Bird Now, won the 2005 Mercury Prize for the year's best album by a British or Irish act, beating Coldplay, M.I.A. and Kaiser Chiefs.

It was quite an achievement for a disc that tackled gender identity in "You Are My Sister" (a duet with Boy George) and "For Today I Am a Boy," which opens with Hegarty singing, "One day I'll grow up, I'll be a beautiful woman."

Hegarty both broadens and distills his focus on The Crying Light, sketching more atmospheric textures with strings players Maxim Moston, Julia Kent and Rob Moose, winds ace Doug Wieselman, bassist Jeff Langston and drummer Parker Kindred (all featured on the current tour). It's a largely contemplative album centered by "Another World," where he laments the need to find another home, noting the birds, bees, snow, and—yes—trees that he's going to miss.

"I'm a child of the Earth," says Hegarty. "There's a theme on the album which is about mourning and grieving the way that we've affected the ecology of our home, our planet. So there's also this idea of a child grieving for the mother."

That haunting tone begins with the CD's cover photo of white-faced Japanese Butoh dancer Kazuo Ohno, who, the singer says, "traverses the space between light and darkness and even life and death in a poetic way."

Hegarty also indulges his love for dance in a video for "Epilepsy Is Dancing" that's codirected by the Wachowski brothers. It includes bare-breasted dancers in a fantasy forest and butterflies that flow from the singer's mouth.

Hegarty says he searches YouTube to watch people dancing. "There's something so primary about it... and singing's the same way," he says. "You're sort of crying out with your body, jumping out for a mysterious feeling you couldn't call one thing. It's that feeling of being alive." ✖✖✖

Ryan, not Bryan

Songbird Prodigious is one way to describe alt-country heartbreaker Ryan Adams. His discography lists 11 albums released since 2000, with songs that often explore his past relationships, struggles with addiction and his hometown of Jacksonville, N.C. Adams recently announced plans to take a break from performing and, although some fans might be skeptical about the news, his show at the Orpheum Theatre with his band, the Cardinals, on Feb. 21 could be your last chance to catch his act. Thais Collins

ROUGE, BLANC ET BLEU

So They're Not Fred and Ginger...

On Inauguration Night, an awful lot of people wanted to be in Washington, D.C., wearing gowns or tuxedos, wedged into a hotel ballroom with thousands of other people, and waiting for the President and First Lady to appear for five minutes and dance like they were made out of cardboard.

Others of us preferred to watch history unfold within reach of an open bar. That's why Community Servings hosted the Red, White and Blue Party at Azure inside the Lenox Hotel. The soiree attracted the likes of Chad Jackson and his stunning other half, Kathryn Burton, international man of mystery Christian Bailey, the triumvirate of Hal Langell, Paul Lanoix and Christopher Robert, the devastatingly handsome CJ Menard with his other half, equestrian tie-designer Tony Corey, WBUR babe Clint Cavanaugh, and one woman who came up to me and said, "If you're deliberately doing that with your hair, fine. Otherwise, I need to fix it." (Ouch.)

Gabriel Frasca at the Super Hunger Chef Challenge

The commander in chief might not have made an actual appearance at the party, but there was a cardboard cutout of him, with which guests could pose for photos, and which prompted an impromptu game of "What would you want to do with Obama?" Surprisingly, none of the answers were sexually suggestive:

"Play basketball with him."

"Have lunch, maybe?"

"Let him run the country!"

Not surprisingly, no one said, "Dance."

Finger-Lickin' Good...

The Four Seasons was transformed into the set of Iron Chef, when the Greater Boston Food Bank held its Super Hunger Chef Challenge: a combination cook-off and pig-out involving four of the region's best restaurateurs.

Mini-kitchens were erected around the ballroom, pitting culinary super-stars Evan Deluty of Stella, Tony Susi of Sage, Gabriel Frasca of Straight Wharf on Nantucket and Will Gilson of Garden at the Cellar against each other, and requiring them to work their magic using only ingredients that the food bank stocks in its pantry.

The result? A five-course feast that guests inhaled with gusto, while the evening's emcee, Dan Andelman of the Phantom Gourmet, kept

Dan Andelman at the Super Hunger Chef Challenge

Mystery guests at Big Night

Steve Miller (middle) and bandmates at Big Night

tabs on the judges: Four Seasons executive chef Brooke Vosika, radio behemoth Glenn Ordway and New England Revolution star Steve Ralston.

So who won? Who cares? The evening raised lots of money for a good cause, and the real winners were everyone who got to eat the grub.

Go Ask Alice...

Despite the Woodstock theme, it seemed to be in questionable taste to do hallucinogenic drugs at Big Night, the epic annual benefit for Big Brothers Big Sisters of Massachusetts Bay, held at the Convention Center. After all, there were kids present.

But thank God for Face Melter, the mobile phone application that allows you to smudge pictures into psychedelic, trippy abstracts. Presumably, this is what the party would have looked like on LSD, and the first reader to match the following captions to the correct pictures will receive an Improper Bostonian T-shirt:

Angela and Seth Raynor of the Pearl on Nantucket

Lenny Clarke and Michael Schlow

WHDH-TV Channel 7 anchor Frances Rivera

Two pseudo-hippies and a Volkswagen Bug

Of course, a T-shirt might seem like small consolation for missing a rockin' costume party that included a four-course feast by celebrity chefs Schlow, Raynor and Ming Tsai, as well as a concert by legendary rockers the Steve Miller Band (who still sound awesome for a bunch of geezers). But what more quintessential rock concert souvenir is there than a T-shirt?

Oh, and PS: I met a college student who claimed to know where to score mushrooms, so the Age of Aquarius isn't totally over, after all. ✖✖✖

Glutton Chic: An Eater's Rationale

A restaurant critic chokes on a McNugget and dies. He wakes up in a fashionable lounge, replete with an exciting small-plates menu and a choice of signature mojitos.

"The specials today are a hamachi tartare with white soy ginger and crispy wontons," says his server, a waxy youth in loose trousers. "And a New York strip accompanied by mustard spaetzle and lovage. Would you prefer tap or bottled water?"

"Tap!" says the critic, with a hint of smugness. "Gotta watch that carbon footprint." Then, just as he settles into the wine list, he notices the fatal line on the menu: We are proud to serve only USDA Select beef. "Noooo!" he screams, finally noticing the whiff of brimstone.

In this age of Slow Food and heirloom yucca, it seems that everyone's a food snob. I, for one, misspent many years with ramen noodles, but I ended up writing a book about the gastronomic and cultural history of cattle (really). The New Gluttony is here to stay and, despite the mess of socio-economic qualms stirred up by, say, a $5 local, organic pepper, this isn't necessarily evil. It educates people about food miles and "carrying capacity." It keeps us honest about the true cost of corn chips. And when lifestyle magazines start flinging around the word "sustainable," even the Lorax would say that's a good thing. Unless you're a pig, in which case you're still liable to get boiled (see page 36).

Small Pond BIG FISH

KRISTA KRANYAK is bringing her work home. For almost seven years, the owner of Ten Tables has trekked from her Somerville house to her wildly popular bistro in Jamaica Plain. Now, with the opening of Ten Tables Cambridge in the spot formerly occupied by Craigie Street Bistrot, she hopes to replicate the success of the JP gem in her own backyard. "I always wanted a restaurant like mine on my side of the river," muses Kranyak, 36.

Like its older sibling, her Cambridge venture serves European dishes in a cozy setting. "It's a very, very similar menu," she says. "Handmade pastas, organically fed meat using local farms."

That includes entrees like the pan-roasted organic salmon (above) and the meal gracing our cover: succulent duck with honey gastriche, Swiss chard, roasted fennel and a dollop of pureed turnip. "It's a mild dish with a lot of popping flavor," she says, recommending a Burgundy as accompaniment.

Not everything is the same, of course. The new restaurant has 14 tables and offerings the original lacks. "We have a Friolator, so we can actually do bistro-style steak frites," she declares proudly.

Kranyak feels she gained a renewed sense of purpose as she and chef/co-owner David Punch renovated the Cambridge space. "I really couldn't be happier," she adds. "I want affordable, accessible food in a bistro setting. I feel like I'm really rooted in that vision now. I'm living it, breathing it and eating it."

Drink of the Moment

Swine Dining

The old L'Espalier had no bar. Squeezed into an antique home, there was no waiting area either. But now, housed at the Mandarin Oriental, L'Espalier sprawls out on the second floor with plenty of room to play with.

Although still bar-less, L'Espalier has a salon, where butlers discreetly mix Manhattans with homemade bitters, and patrons sit nibbling sweetbreads, gazing at the wine wall storing Bordeaux at 10K a bottle. There's a patina of posh; on the surface L'Espalier is everything you'd expect it to be.

Until you notice the sweetbreads come with waffles. And while the Manhattan is excellent, the Pig and Whistle is more inspired. Made from bacon-infused tequila, it's not a cocktail you'd expect at such an institution, but perhaps it's best to leave preconceptions at the door. "You'd be surprised," hints sommelier Kate Moore. "We don't get a lot of margaritas, but it's fun. People like to experiment."

Well-designed, the Pig and Whistle ($14) covers the spectrum, with the saltiness of bacon and sour of tequila marrying the bitter and sweet notes of muddled apples and sage. Well-rounded, no one flavor dominates. It even takes a bit of guesswork to spot the pig. There's a smoothness that defies first impressions, like the space itself. "There's something very understated about it, and I think that adds a bit of mystery," says Moore, keying in on the theme. "It's not meant to be fancy, it's meant to be fun." NICK ALTSCHULLER

In Praise of Eggplant

Sicilians fry it with celery, vinegar and capers for caponata. The French stew it with tomatoes, onions and zucchini for ratatouille. But Indians show eggplant true respect. They call it "king of vegetables"—not just for its multitasking reputation, but for its transformative role in baingan bhartha. At Punjab Palace, the dish is a three-step process. An open flame chars the fruit's dense flesh before the chef mashes it with plenty of ginger, garlic and heady spices. Finally, it takes a turn in the skillet with onions, peas and barely wilted green chiles (heat-seekers, go nuts!). The result is smoky, silky, faintly sweet—and positively addictive when scooped up with a swatch of garlicky naan. ELIZABETH BOMZE

ASK THE EXPERT

BEACON HILL BISTRO'S EXECUTIVE CHEF JASON BOND PICKS HIS IDEAL RESTAURANTS FOR:

Q: WHAT ARE YOUR NON-BHB SPOTS?

A first date... I like the North End. Lots to talk about. Lots of sweets, informal atmosphere. My first date with my significant other was at UpStairs on the Square and we had the entire dining room to ourselves (they were closed for a function downstairs). That made for a nice evening by the fireplace. They have very reasonably priced champagne, too.

Kid-friendly dining... Blue Moon in Huron Village, Red Bones. UpStairs on the Square, but for lunch—who doesn't like zebras?

Power lunch... Last thing I want to do is chew in front of someone I want to impress. Even more, I like to eat out. I won't ruin it by talking business. Meals together should be for getting to know someone. See if you like them, then pull the laptop out back at the hotel lobby. If you must, and you don't know them, then maybe the Bristol is pretty much made for standardized business-like sensibilities.

Impressing the folks... I like to take my family to the places in Boston that can really cook and give fabulous service. Craigie, No. 9, Oleana. The Druid in Inman Square has the best Irish pub food in town right now. For real!

Wowing out-of-towners... Locke-Ober is No. 1, and Smith & Wollensky in the castle is beautiful. You have to walk around all the floors. ALLIE VASILAKIS

Terrific Tintos

After years of being underground favorites, Spain's red wines have finally emerged into the spotlight. The main reason they're starting to pop up everywhere? Because even some of the extreme-bargain wines taste startlingly good. Plus, they're great with food. So, though few people here know much about its regions or grape varieties, Americans keep buying more wine from Spain every year. It now ranks fourth among countries we import from, growing at a pace of around 5 percent during 2008 and bucking the downward trend affecting most foreign wines. If there's one visionary who generated excitement about Spain before most people cared, it's Jorge Ordoñez, a Massachusetts-based importer who's been at it for two decades. As a recent tasting once again proved, his hand-picked selections are stellar across the board, regardless of how unknown their origins remain. These three are real winners in the deep-value category. They may not be easy to remember, but once you try them, they'll be tough to forget.

Volver, La Mancha, 2005 ($19.99, BLM Wine + Spirits, Allston). OK, $19.99 doesn't seem like a steal, but try a sip and then tell me the wine doesn't taste twice as expensive. Aged for more than a year in new French oak barrels, Volver's made by the same producer as Paso a Paso, but it's even riper and more intense, with super-concentrated sweet jammy black cherry fruit that's got this tobacco-like spicy edge to it. The tannins are higher, so if you're inclined, you can put this one away for a few years. Or drink it now with some roast chicken rubbed in aromatic herbs.

Monte Oton, Campo de Borja, 2007 ($9.50, the Wine Press, Brookline). If you crave Garnacha (in France it's called Grenache) as much as I do, the Aragon region, a mountainous zone just south of the French border, mights be the best-kept secret in the world. Medium-bodied and softly textured, the Monte Oton is long on charm and pure cherry-like character. This is a "joven" (unoaked) red that is juicy, balanced and mineral-accented; serve it a little cool and pump up the refreshment potential or savor it at room temp with some salty appetizers.

Paso a Paso Tinto, La Mancha, 2007 ($11.99, the Wine Emporium, Boston). La Mancha is the world's largest officially demarcated wine region, a vast sun-drenched plain that occupies the center of Spain. Because the bulk of its production isn't something you'd want to drink (trust me) there are amazing values to be had, like this pure tempranillo (the fashionista grape of Rioja) produced from 40 year-old vines grown at higher elevations. Opaque in color, with a licorice and wild-berry aroma, it's a rich-tasting red that will have you licking your lips. A lingering coffee-mocha flavor accents the fruit, making this an ideal match for rare, grilled tuna.

Master of Wine Sandy Block is vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods.

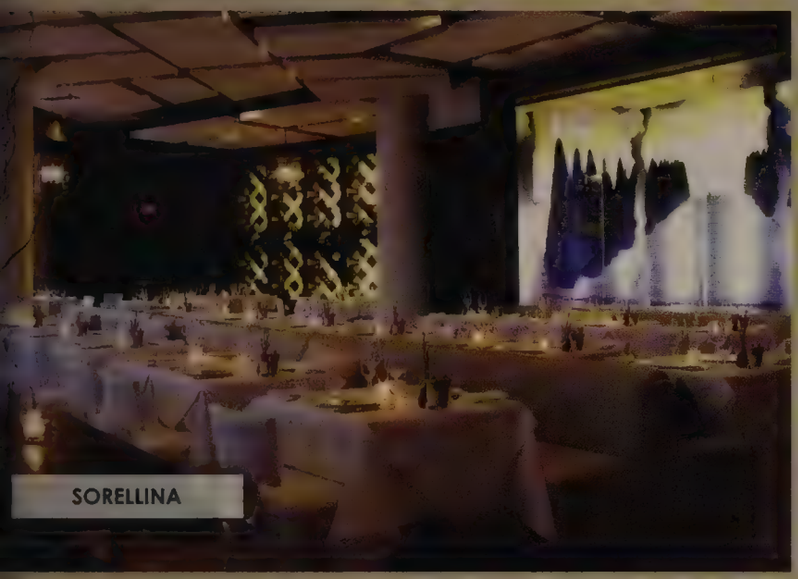
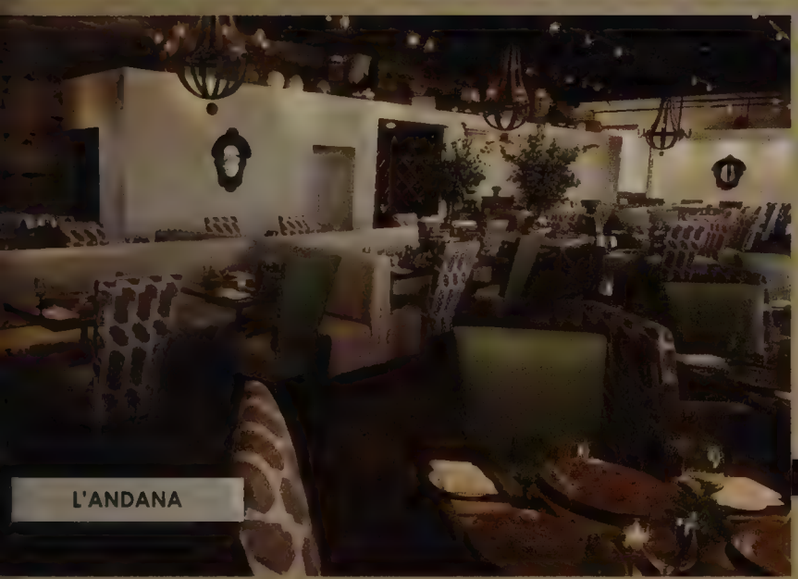
STEPH COMPETITION

In the space formerly occupied by the Garden of Eden Cafe in the South End, a scene of frantic construction might trick a bystander into forgetting the plummeting economy, or into thinking an episode of Extreme Makeover: Home Edition was unfolding.

Standing in the dust, between a whirling tablesaw and hard-hatted workmen, owner Stephanie Sokolove gestures proudly across the expanse and describes the extent of the renovations for her second restaurant, Stephi's on Tremont. "There was a barren wall essentially across [this area]. Staircase in the middle of the room. This place really needed to be cleaned up. There's way too much competition and good food in the city. You can't operate out of a space that's substandard."



As she steps over unfinished boards and around a ladder, Sokolove points out luxe details like a chandelier and a marble wall, as well as the "soothing warm-color" palette chosen to complement her food, which she describes in equally panacean terms: "edible, reliable, comfy." Popular dishes from Stephanie's on Newbury, such as the mac 'n' cheese and the entrée salads, will join lobster shepherd's pie and paninis on chef Corey Comeau's evolving menu. Which, like its setting, is also under construction. "We're going to work on the menu until the day we open," Sokolove says. "It's trial and error. If something's not selling in two weeks, it's gone."



But while both restaurants share a customer-focused, adaptive sensibility, Sokolove sees Stephi's on Tremont as more of a neighborhood eatery than its older, tourist-inclined sibling on Newbury. Seating 65 inside, with outdoor dining planned for the warmer months, the mini-Stephanie's is having its big reveal the first week of March. With no shortage of consumers seeking reliability amid troubled times, all signs point to a strong reception.

LORD OF THE DANCE

Is it getting sexy in here, or is it just me?

MY MOTHER FANCIES me as a dancer. She's exceedingly proud of all that her handsome, genius son has accomplished, but were I to win a Pulitzer, I know that at the reception, she'd be disappointed if I didn't ask Joyce Carol Oates for a waltz.

I don't know what created the illusion. Perhaps it's because my sister has the coordination of a newborn mare with Jell-O hooves, and simply walking without stumbling makes me Gene Kelly in comparison. To her, I have a talent that must be shared. Once, in college, I made the mistake of mentioning that my friend Geoff had signed up for a dance class. It didn't matter that Geoff was a lazy goof and just scrambling for a phys-ed credit. She chose to see Geoff as debonair, and that I was just squandering my gifts, and over the course of the next month, she constantly reminded me of all the girls she was sure Geoff was scoring. (It was very uncomfortable.)

Now, at weddings, I'm prodded to hit the floor with the older ladies. She's like my pimp, and I'm some impressionable youth in tap shoes she found at the bus station. I know that somewhere in her mind, there plays a bizarre version of Dirty Dancing where I embrace my love for twirling and no one puts her baby in a corner.

Thing is, I like dancing. I can usually find the rhythm, I don't dance with my thumbs up and I hardly ever bite my lower lip. But I wouldn't say I actually know how. So after a recommendation from a friend, I went to An Tua Nua, where on Wednesday nights, $20 gets you all the salsa you could want and a little bit more than I could handle.

A trio of lessons began at 7, as did the quick destruction of my confidence. It's uncomfortable arriving solo to an activity that requires a partner, and that feeling only grew when the beginners gathered. There were five of us. Being a loner creep does have advantages though, as it forces the instructor to dance with you and thus accelerate your education.

My first lesson was perhaps salsa's most important: Men lead and women just have to look pretty. It sounds sexist, but it's a tough job, as no matter the number of missteps, ladies have to act like they're dancing with virility incarnate. Since I danced predominately with the instructor, I was amazing.

My second lesson was more biomechanical. Salsa is about tight, small steps, and I tend to walk like I'm constantly stepping over things. Years ago, a track coach taught me that speed equals stride length plus stride frequency, and I apply that knowledge in my everyday life. It's another example of the failings of my mind, as I've met a lot of wise people, and the tossed-off instructions from a sport I didn't even particularly like are what stick. But through sheer willpower—and pretending my feet were chained together—I managed to shorten my steps, and the directions I actually wanted to learn began to sink in.

Sports actually began to help in the second hour, as we moved onto casino rueda, which is like salsa square dancing. "But like sexy square dancing, not that square dancing isn't sexy," corrected one of the organizers. There's a lot of pivoting, and my muscle memories from basketball began to surface. There's also a lot of stomping, and the timing and footwork reminded me of my high-jumping days. Of course, the wear and tear of both those activities have left my right ankle with what my orthopedist charitably labeled "incompetent ligaments," and as the third hour rolled around, my foot was flopping like a dying fish. But like a sexy dying fish.

Hour three was a return to basic steps, but these lessons were led by Johnny and Kelly, two mariposas del sexy who opened class by shaking, strutting and gyrating on stage, their hips swinging like wrecking balls aimed at the foundation of my ego. By 9 pm, the room was full and the experience level had risen, but thankfully, every veteran in a fly collar was counterbalanced with an unrhythmic rookie.

The wheat once again separated from the chaff, my fellow beginners and I regrouped into a larger circle. Now, with the basics down cold, I could pull my focus away from my feet and observe the group at large. Salsa night is an amazing sociological study and an event where desperately trying to be graceful becomes an allegory for the clumsiness of romance. Some fight to lead, others are happy to follow. Women are either looking for their men to dance or men to dance with, and men are just seeking affirmation. At the end of the hour, my last partner looked up and declared me the best in the circle. With three hours of salsa left, but grateful for the chance to leave on a high note, I grabbed my coat and floated home.

I had fun with salsa and even went to Masa to try it again the following night—with a partner no less. But to be honest, the lessons really weren't about me. I had a different woman I was looking to impress.

That Saturday I met my mother for lunch, and after discussing one of my recent social faux pas, I strategically played my dance card. "Well that just cheers me right up," she said, rising slightly in her seat. "You know, if you liked salsa, I'm sure there's lots of other dance classes around town you could take." ✖✖✖

SHOE GOES THERE?

TO THE NIKETOWN CREW: This weekend, I had the balls to walk into Niketown and ask a cashier if they sold Adidas running shoes. In the midst of asking one employee, another employee completely stopped what she was doing, whipped her head around and stared at me with pursed lips to determine if I was for real or not. The looks they shot at me were pretty unforgettable, despite my pleasant tone. They were both such good sports that I think they deserve a public apology as well as an explanation. I was asking this ridiculous question to impress my BF on Valentine's Day—which is also his birthday! I had dared him to ask the Adidas question as part of a scavenger hunt, but I just didn't have the heart to let him go through with it. So I opted to shamelessly ask myself. I apologize.

GOOD GRIEF

Heartache, anger and romance in a journey to the wilds of widowhood

OBVIOUSLY, WIDOWHOOD is a world away from being single, divorced or, of course, married. Janie, with two young children, assumes that lonely condition when her helmet-less husband Robby crashes on his motorcycle. The grieving, cranky and overwhelmed Janie holds her kids tight. Her family's self-centeredness—her mother ensconced in Italy and her twin brother Mike with Asperger's—adds to her feelings of abandonment. But a dreaded self-defense class crystallizes Janie's anger with surprising exuberance.

Then along comes Father Jake, whose grief counseling evolves gently into an intimacy that is a tad shy of inappropriate, though midnight e-mails fly. Actually, his priestly rectitude and romantic unavailability makes him a fitting backboard for Janie's anger and longing. Jake's melancholy distance also protects some trauma of his own. There's also Tug, the contractor building a porch conceived by Robby. Tug is a natural almost-daddy magnet for Janie's son Dylan, who copes with loss by wearing goggles evoking his father's motorcycle while providing the child with rubbery eye protection. Tug's presence and their joint building project provides another push-pull for Janie, whose fierceness regarding the porch and other things, invites Tug's appealing patience and tolerance. Yes, their romance develops, but slowly. This novel is compellingly cozy as it tracks Janie—her motherhood, her grief and her varied relationships—in the widow-wilds. ×××

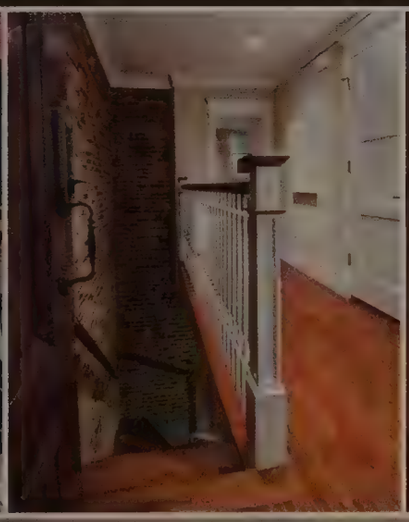
ALL WRAPPED UP



Recession, recession, recession. Right now it's all about stressing and saving—but I'm fed up. Because I can only handle so much H&M and ramen noodles, and because mental stability is priceless, I found myself at the Spa at Mandarin Oriental desperately looking forward to a De-Stress Mind Body Wrap. I pictured being swaddled—reminding me of a time when nothing mattered in the world. But, despite its name, I was pleased there was nothing constricting about it. The treatment started with an exfoliation process, where months of dry skin, subway pollution and self-tanner were scrubbed away in minutes. Afterward, I received a pressure point–focused massage. And to top it off, I was lightly wrapped in a blanket, inhaling notes of chamomile and frankincense while receiving a mind-numbing scalp massage. Admittedly, the greatest part wasn't that hour and 20 minutes, but the three perfect nights' sleep to follow. I recommend going on a Friday and indulging in its effects all weekend long. AMANDA KNORR

Lady Marmalade About this time of year, Bonnie Shershow has had just about enough of New England's puffy gray skies, snow sludge and subfreezing wind chills. Her response? Marmalade. The Southern California native was raised on tree-ripened oranges from her family's orchard, and she finds jamming a way to "steam up the kitchen and take some solace from winter." A few weeks ago, her oversized copper pot stationed in Formaggio Kitchen's kitchen welcomed Cara Cara oranges and Meyer lemons; she also boiled habañero chilies into a tangy pepper jelly now on the menu at Audubon Circle. In the meantime, she's counting down the days until strawberry season in May.

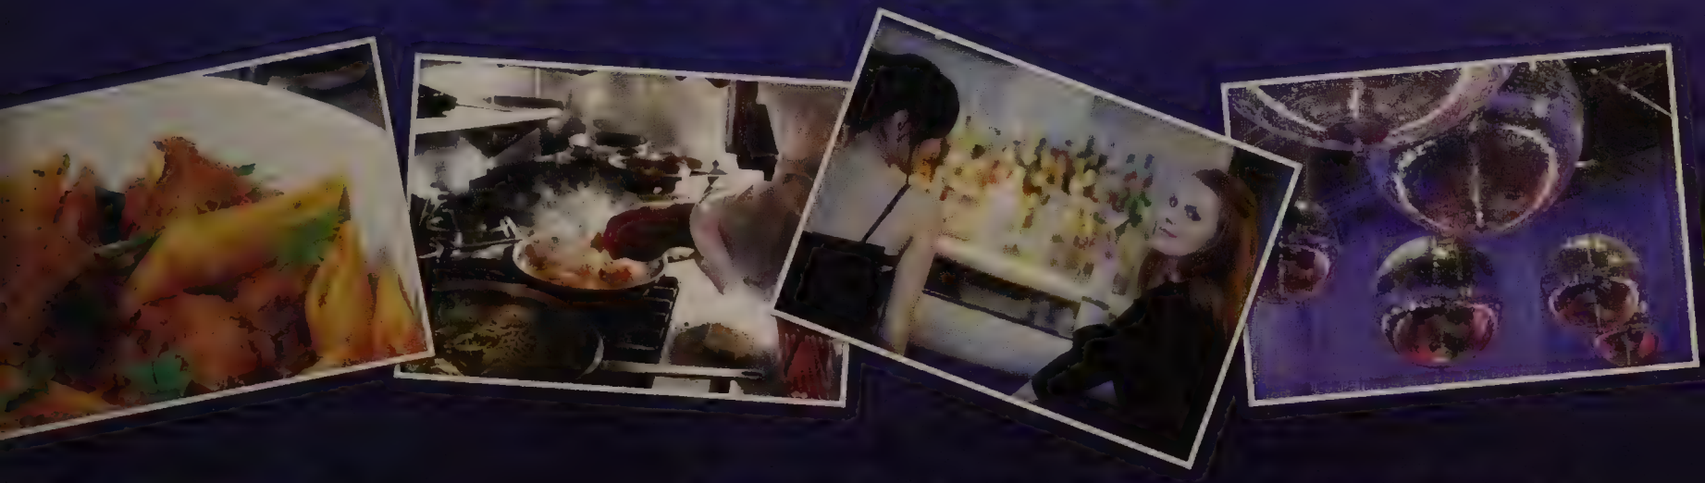
THE LATEST TORY EVER TOLD

Blasé about delay

IN THESE TOUGH economic times, you can hear the tension in the voices of most restaurateurs. Matt Curtis, though, could not sound more mellow as he muses about the much-delayed opening of Tory Row in Cambridge, which was originally slated to begin serving over a year ago.

"We're just slow," he deadpans. "We" are Curtis and Chris Lutes, who also own a mini-empire of well-regarded restaurants in Boston and Cambridge: Middlesex Lounge, Miracle of Science, Cambridge 1 and Audubon Circle.

Tory Row, located in Harvard Square in the former Greenhouse Cafe site, will feature a "European-American" menu, says Curtis. For example? Well, as compared to the "grill-focused" fare at Miracle of Science and Middlesex, and the charcoal-grilled pizzas at Cambridge 1, the menu, still being fine-tuned, will "highlight oven-baked strategies," he explains.



Still in suspense? Tory Row, according to Curtis, should finally be open sometime in March, adding that prices will be "Reasonable. Post-stimulus package reasonable. We've never been aggressive with our pricing."

CAN YOU GUESS THE V-WORD that's the focus of a recent press release from the Taj Boston Hotel? Hint: it's not vegan. Or vindaloo, in keeping with the Indian ownership of the former Ritz Boston. No, it's "value" in the bar and cafe. Through the middle of March, lunch and dinner prix-fixe specials at the cafe are priced from $15 (two-course lunch) to $30 (three-course dinner). Plus, a glass of champagne or a cocktail at the bar comes with complimentary tapas.

CLOSINGS: THREE Z-SQUARE locations have reached the end of the line: Harvard Square, Kenmore Square and Post Office Square. On Newbury Street, Croma (home of British pizza and sticky toffee pudding) is apparently gone, despite a notice on the company's Web site that it's "closed for the season." Is there a pizza season?

Dining { BY ERIN BYERS MURRAY AND MARY DUMONT }

SOUTHERN BELLE

Franklin Southie puts a sophisticated spin on comfort food.

FRESH ATMOSPHERE Dine on dishes like the mache salad at the bar or in a booth.

AFTER A SUCCESSFUL opening in November, Franklin Southie had a bit of a falling out. Or a falling down, rather, when panels dropped from the dining room ceiling, injuring 11 customers in the middle of the busy dinner rush. The ceiling has since been fixed and the restaurant reopened, but every time I'd invite friends there for dinner, they'd shudder.

Being no Chicken Little, I asked Harvest chef Mary Dumont to help me get to the more important issue of Franklin Southie's food.

Dumont arrived a few minutes after I did and surveyed the room. Having grown up in the hospitality industry (her folks owned a restaurant near Portsmouth, N.H., for years), her eye is trained to target behind-the-scene details. "The space looks awesome," she raved, before ordering a glass of the Sepp Moser grüner veltliner ($8). "Must be doing alright," she added, nodding at the crowd. "It's Monday and they're doing good business."

The room has the polished, dark-lit look of a downtown lounge, a feeling punctuated when a white-haired gentleman at the bar left with a young blonde. But it manages to feel utterly South Boston, as the two guys in sweatshirts sitting beside him haggled over politics and a couple of pints.

As a second expansion of the South End's Franklin Café, this location's menu has reasonably priced comfort food, and we immediately picked up on a vegetarian trend. According to owner Dave Dubois, Franklin Southie wanted to offer plenty of options for its neighbors at the MaCallen Building, a green condo development across the street. Dumont herself had actually been a vegetarian for years.

Over a plate of Duxbury Bay oysters ($2 each), she walked me through her career path from line cook to her executive chef gigs at Campton Place in San Francisco, Blackbird in Chicago and later Sonoma Saveurs, where she fell in love with the California wine country. "Outside of where I grew up, it's the closest thing to home I've ever had," Dumont said.

She eventually moved back to Portsmouth and opened the Dunaway at Strawbery Banke, where she was named one of Food & Wine's Best New Chefs of 2006. Then, when a chef position opened at Harvest, she jumped at the chance.

Together, we moved through the menu with a trio of appetizers. A plate of skillet-roasted mussels ($9) put the shellfish front and center, the flavor accented with a light sprinkle of parsley and a ramekin of clarified butter. The mache salad ($8) with slivers of Bartlett pears and shaved pecorino was a perfect combo of acid and flavor.

Dumont was intrigued by the deconstructed vitello tonnato ($11), a row of warm, sliced, grilled veal beside a chilled tuna tartare spiked with a lemony hit of aioli. "I've tried versions where it's veal carpaccio, but I like the way the hot and cold go together," she concluded.

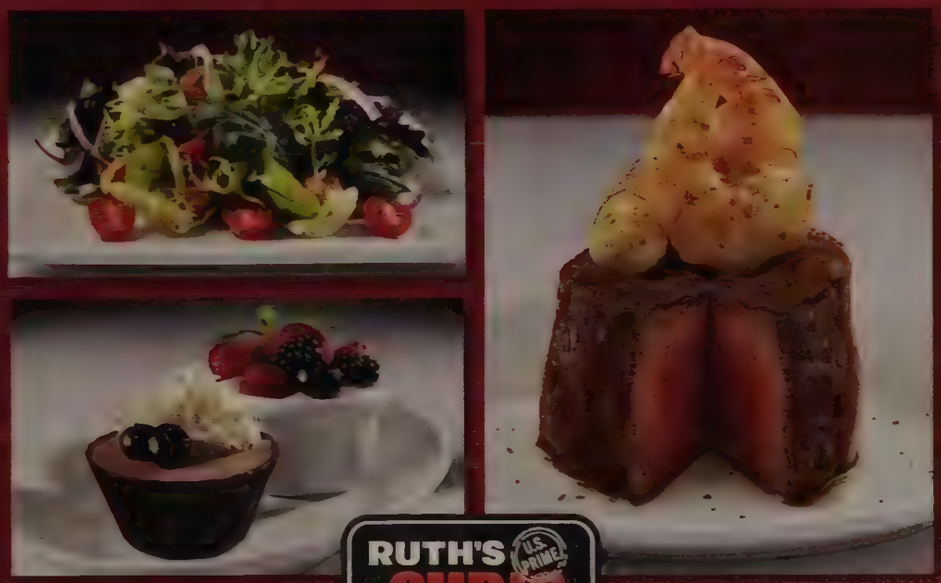
Spice-grilled tofu steak ▲

Sirloin

Dipping into the vegetarian offerings, we tried the spice-grilled tofu steak ($16). It arrived topped with a fried farm egg in a deep bowl of rice, which our server encouraged us to mix all together. Dumont did the honors with relish, turning a beautiful dish into what looked like standard fried rice. But each bite produced balanced bits of pineapple, crispy-skinned tofu, rice and egg. Our second entrée, a sirloin ($20), came well-prepared alongside a duo of massive celery root tater tots, which unfortunately weren't very crispy and had thick, doughy interiors.



As we finished, our ever-attentive server apologized profusely for the fact that the restaurant doesn't serve dessert. "It's OK. I'm not even a fan of dessert," Dumont replied. So we ordered coffee, which was tabled just so, both spoons pointing to 5 o'clock.

"Huh," said Dumont, mindful of a restaurant's overall aesthetic. "It's always the simplest things that make a meal." ×××

FARE THEE HELL

All cab companies are not created equal.

TRAVEL BRINGS OUT THE cheapness in people. Instead of the $350 direct flight to Miami aboard a nice, new jet, the irrationally cheap traveler opts for the $300 flight aboard a plane that was last owned by the Red Baron and has chickens in the back, connects through Milwaukee and Des Moines and lands at the kind of airport where the control tower is a guy on a stepladder with a pair of binoculars.

I'm aware of my own susceptibility to this problem, so I consciously try to overcome it when planning trips. I book direct flights, even if they're a case of beer more expensive. And I'll blow $20 more per night on a hotel that hasn't had any murders in the past six months. If I'm feeling really flush, I'll even spend the extra $3.42 per day to upgrade from the Kia Rio to the Chevy Cobalt. But I recently went against my own policy when choosing a cab, under the premise that all cab companies are the same, and thus, the cheapest cab wins.

I have to leave for the airport at 4:45 am. So the night before, I call a cab company, where a cheerful woman informs me that they go by the meter, and the fare will be about $45. Then I call a second company, where I'm quoted a flat rate of $42.50. The dispatcher sounds like he's spent the past decade shackled upside-down in a dungeon. Judging by the hopelessness and quiet rage in his voice, this is a situation where I should spend the extra $2.50.

And the next morning, I really wish I had.

When I climb into the backseat of a battered Grand Marquis, the cabbie sent by the Dungeon Dispatcher immediately hits me with the no-change gambit. "I should tell you right now, I don't have any change," he says. I hate the no-change ploy. It's such an obvious scam to fish for a $19 tip.

"Well, all I've got is $49, then," I tell him. Normally I'd tip a couple bucks more than that for a ride to Logan, but that's his fault. "Ah, man, this is the last trip on my shift, and that'll put me two bucks short to pay my rent," he says. There are a couple of flaws in this plea. First, it's the end of your shift and you have absolutely no money for change? Second, it's the 12th day of the month. He must have one of those rare leases that begins on the 12th.

"Well, tell you what," I say. "You can stop at the next Dunkin' Donuts if you want."

"Why? Is there an ATM at Dunkin' Donuts?" he asks. Yeah, I think to myself, it's a new kind of ATM that dispenses change. I tell him no, that I'd just buy a coffee, assuming that he'll make the connection between a cup of coffee and change for a $20 bill. This, though, is a leap too far. "Stops aren't included in the fare," he says.

"Listen, I don't care if you stop or not," I say. "But if you want a couple extra bucks, then I'll break a 20 by buying a coffee, OK?" He assents.

Soon after, there's another request from up front. "When we get there, I need to call in for the end of my shift," he says. "Can I borrow your phone?" I approve this request, as well as the next one as to whether he can smoke, and the next one about whether he can run a red light. Hey, not my license.

Soon, though, I start leaning to the middle of the seat and scanning the road ahead for cops, because my Newport-smoking, phoneless friend is doing 25 miles per hour over the speed limit. And this is definitely the kind of guy who, if he got pulled over, would turn out to have an outstanding warrant. It would be for something ridiculous, like failing to show up for jury duty, and as he got led away in cuffs I'd be left standing by the side of the road with my luggage at 5 am, wishing I'd spent the extra $2.50.

As we approach the airport, the phone rings. And it's not my phone. True, my increasingly discredited wheelman never explicitly said he didn't have a phone, but that's the sort of thing that's implied when you ask to borrow someone else's. After a brief, tense conversation about his inconveniently revealed cell phone, the cabbie matches my gaze in the rearview mirror and explains, "I'm almost out of minutes." Of course you are.

At the airport, I let him borrow my phone. And then, despite his casual relationship with the truth, I tip him $10. After all, he got me from the Sea Street Dunkin' Donuts to Terminal 3 in 18 minutes, which might be the fastest Quincy-to-Logan time not set by an airplane. Like I say, when you're traveling, you should pay a little extra for service like that. ✖✖✖

BASEBALL'S BLACK EYE

The steroids scandal is bad now and will only get worse.

Joe Skipper/Reuters/Corbis

IT WAS THE SECOND WEEK of February, a time when pitchers, catchers and 80-degree temperatures were supposed to be dominating the baseball world. Instead, this normally pleasant time of year transformed into an opportunity for the latest round of skeletons to emerge from Major League Baseball's closet.

Black History Month? How about Black Eye Month?

The game's biggest star, Alex Rodriguez, tested positive for steroids. Sure, it was back in 2003, but it doesn't matter when it happened. What mattered is that it happened at all.

Collins is a sportscaster for New England News. Contact him at chris@improper.com.

Given the odds, one of those 103 [names] is likely wearing a "B" on his cap.

Was the admission shocking? No. Surprising? Nope. Puzzling? As Bill Parcells used to say around here, "Hell no!" Take another look at A-Rod's numbers from those juicing years: He averaged 52 homers a season! But then, slowly but surely, MLB began to catch onto the steroids craze. First, there was Jose Canseco's book, which at the time seemed crazy, but nowadays looks prophetic. Then there were the congressional hearings, and after that, a government-funded steroid investigation. All of a sudden, A-Rod's home-run totals went down to 39 a year... and he was still in his 20s!

When you look at the facts, none of this comes as much of a surprise. Now we need to ask the question, should A-Rod be forgiven? The answer really comes down to how you choose to perceive his apology. Is A-Rod, like he said, "truly sorry" for cheating the game, or is he just sorry that he got caught? Does he feel bad that he did steroids, or is he just upset that using may have cost him a spot in the Hall of Fame?

You can probably throw Red Sox pitcher John Smoltz in the category of doubters, considering how the future Hall of Famer recently wondered why, if all these roiders were truly sorry, none of them came out and apologized before they got caught. That's a great point. But before we jump to any of our own grand conclusions, maybe we need to put ourselves in the players' shoes.

By hitting 50–60 homers a year, instead of 35–40, these guys made themselves millions upon millions of dollars. If someone told you that a couple of shots in your butt would translate to more than 500 career home runs and $275 million, would you turn it down?

The answer seems pretty simple.

These are all unfortunate things we're forced to ponder as we cope with life as a baseball fan during the Steroids Era. And sadly, the situation is only going to get worse. The other 103 names on that list are a ticking time bomb, especially when you consider that, given the odds, one of those 103 is likely wearing a "B" on the front of his cap.

And then what? Will we look at him as a disgrace or question the motives of his eventual public apology? It's hard to say.

This stinks. It really does. But it's not over. It shouldn't be over. Despite our fear of whose name might pop up on the remaining list of 103 users, we need to know who they are. It's the only way we can finally try and move on. ✖✖✖

ON SOCKS, KNEES, MANNY AND MAILBOXES

3 Red Sox Truths

THERE ARE A LOT OF QUESTIONS HEADING INTO THE SPRING, BUT THESE THREE FACTS ARE AS GOOD AS GOLD.

Lester's the Man... Josh Beckett might have a better flare for the dramatic, and Dice-K might have the nastiest stuff, but Jon Lester's the guy who'll carry the Sox rotation in 2009. With Lester, Tito won't have to worry about injuries, focus or an oh-so-delicate psyche. He'll give Lester the ball every fifth day and just know he'll get it done. Pencil him in for at least 18 wins. Seriously, go find a pencil.

Papi's Clean... When David Ortiz suggested that a positive steroid test should result in a one-year suspension, it was either a clear declaration of his innocence or the ballsiest thing a former 'roider's ever said. We're going with the former. Sure, the big fella's broken down a bit in recent years, but Papi's not that guy. He's too much of a teddy bear to shoot up. Hell, he's probably even scared of needles.

Smoltz is Schilling... An aging superstar with conservative values and love for the microphone comes to Boston for one more shot at postseason glory. Wait, where have we heard this before? As far as we're concerned, John Smoltz can do and say what he wants, as long as he's ready to roll by June and in top form by October. We'll even keep a bloody sock handy. Just in case.

5 RANDOM CELTICS THOUGHTS

The KG Cam... Here's a fun game for the next time you're watching a Celtics' road game: After any big play, immediately close your eyes and picture what Kevin Garnett's reaction is back at home. Is he on all fours, smacking the living room floor? Is he talking trash at the other players? Or maybe he's intensely screaming at his knee: "Come on, dawg. You know you gettin' better now! I wanna feeeel you gettin' better, dawg!"

Chant Away... You laughed; you mocked. You even created a Facebook group in his "honor." But while you did, Brian Scalabrine was plotting his way back into the Celtics rotation. Now, with less than two months left in the season, Scal's presence will go a long way in determining which team wins the East's No. 1 seed. When healthy, he's the most experienced, consistent and versatile option on Doc's bench.

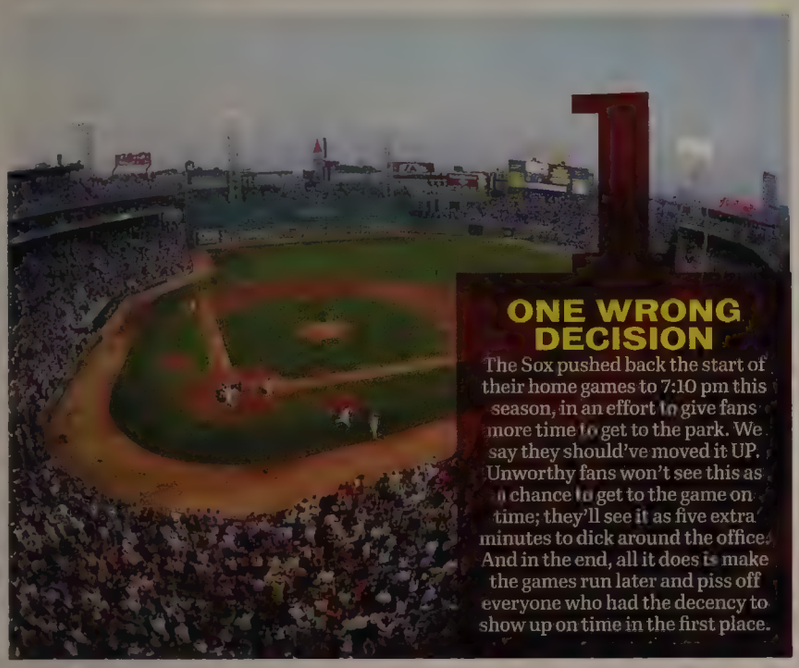
Seeing Starburys... Say what you want about Stephon Marbury (and you can say a lot). But you have to give him credit for trying to fit in with the Celtics tradition. After all, no one asked him to honor the late, great Dennis Johnson by tattooing the No. 3 onto his forehead. That was all Starbury. Classy move, Steph. Classy move.

Your Biweekly Rondo Rave... It's Game 7 of the NBA Finals and you have your choice of any point guard in the league. Maybe Chris Paul, Deron Williams, Tony Parker and Chauncey Billups are your Top 4 picks. But who's No. 5? Steve Nash? Baron Davis? Nah, give us Rajon Rondo. Or as he'll be known from now on: "Top-5 NBA Point Guard" Rajon Rondo.

Show Us Moore... It's hard to draw any definitive conclusions on a player after only a few games, but you've got to be encouraged by the early returns on Mikki Moore. He's shown range we never knew he had; a head for the game that, on the surface, seemed nonexistent; and he might just be quirky enough to become a legitimate fan favorite. Now if only he didn't remind us so much of Pervis Ellison.

4 DATES TO WATCH

3/5 The semi-annual World Baseball Classic gets under way at various international locations. Big Papi and the Dominicans take the field in Mexico City. But, shh! They told A-Rod the games are in Australia.



3/6 LeBron and the Cavs visit Boston for the last time this regular season. On a related note, if anyone has updated contact information for Jeff Gillooly, we'd appreciate it if you'd send it our way. Just curious what he's been up to.

3/15 Kevin Youkilis turns 30 years old, which is weird, because in our head he's perpetually 25. There's something about watching a guy come up through the farm system that always makes him seem younger. It's like, how can Youk be 30 when Nomar's still only 27?

3/17 Get online, fill out those brackets and start thinking of an excuse to leave work, because it's time for March Madness. Or as it's otherwise known, the three weeks every year when Dick Vitale can leave his Viagra in the medicine cabinet. (Sorry, that's disgusting.)

Fenway Park: Courtesy of the Boston Red Sox

1 ONE WRONG DECISION

The Sox pushed back the start of their home games to 7:10 pm this season, in an effort to give fans more time to get to the park. We say they should've moved it UP. Unworthy fans won't see this as a chance to get to the game on time; they'll see it as five extra minutes to dick around the office. And in the end, all it does is make the games run later and piss off everyone who had the decency to show up on time in the first place.

TAKE 5 BONUS TRACK

Kevin Youkilis' upcoming birthday got us thinking: Now that Tom Brady, Randy Moss, the Big Three and Big Papi are all residing on the other side of 30, who's the biggest star in Boston yet to reach the milestone?

Rondo and Jerod Mayo might get there in time, but they still have room to grow. Wes Welker's probably earned himself a mention, but doesn't quite fill the bill. Josh Beckett? Still needs to prove he can bounce back from last year. Matt Cassel? Too soon. And while Jonathan Papelbon might have the biggest personality, he plays in less than half of the Red Sox' games.

That leaves us with Dustin Pedroia: The undisputed king of Boston's Under-30 Club. Not that you're surprised, right? We'll be sending Dustin a trophy to display right between the MVP and ROY (which we only assume he will).

2 JOB SUGGESTIONS FOR MANNY | BECAUSE IF HE DOESN'T SIGN, HE'LL HAVE TO WORK SOMEWHERE

Manny the Mailman Can't you see Manny walking around the suburbs and whistling some fancy tune, while wearing hiked-up navy-blue shorts and a messenger bag? He'd be friends with the stay-at-home moms, wrestle with all the dogs and, every once in while, just for fun, he'd pee in someone's mailbox.

NASA Think Tank The world of space exploration is always looking for free thinkers, men who won't be tied down by the chains of conventional wisdom. And who's better at that than Manny? He'd have great input on life on Mars, killer concepts for shuttle designs and, every once in while, just for fun, he'd pee in someone's spacesuit.

Soroff On RICHARD GOODWIN

The playwright and former White House insider on the Kennedys, Cuban cigars and the art of speechwriting PLAYWRIGHT, PRESIDENTIAL ADVISOR and author Richard Goodwin was born in Boston, raised in Brookline and attended Brookline High School. After graduating summa cum laude from Tufts, he earned a law degree from Harvard. He began his career as a prosecutor in the 1950s quiz-show scandals, on which Robert Redford based the film Quiz Show. He went on to serve as senior advisor to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, writing some of their most memorable speeches. A longtime contributor to The New Yorker, Goodwin is author of The Sower's Seed: A Tribute to Adlai Stevenson, The American Condition and other books. The Huntington Theatre Company will present his play about Galileo and Pope Urban VIII, Two Men of Florence, from March 6 through April 5. Goodwin and his wife, acclaimed historian Doris Kearns Goodwin, live in Concord.

Jonathan Soroff: What's harder, writing a play or a presidential speech?
Richard Goodwin: A play. You have to create the characters. With a speech, you're writing for a person you know. With speeches, you also have a purpose.

Secret to writing a good speech?
All very good speeches have a dramatic arc: a beginning, middle and end. Of course, you also have to capture the voice of the person delivering the speech. I had to differentiate between LBJ and JFK, but I knew those guys.

Secret to writing a good play?
Making things happen onstage as opposed to just telling people about them. I think it's the hardest form of writing, which is why we have so few great plays.

Is Two Men of Florence the best thing you've ever written?
I hope so.

Which did you think was better: McCain's concession speech or Obama's victory speech?
I was inclined to think Obama's. I know a bit about concession speeches, though. I wrote Al Gore's. I like writing victory speeches better.

Fondest memory of LBJ?
I was standing in the well of the House of Representatives when he gave the "We Shall Overcome" speech, which really worked a transformation in America. It was maybe the greatest stride in civil rights since the Civil War.

During JFK's administration, did it feel like Camelot at the time?
It didn't feel much like that at the time. It was certainly exciting, and we were deeply engaged. We felt like we were really doing something. In retrospect, though, 40 years later, it did seem like an idyllic or idealistic time.

If a genie offered to introduce you to one figure from history, whom would you choose and why?
I'd love to talk to Abe Lincoln. He was the greatest man of any generation.

Do you have a favorite presidential memento?
I have the box that held the Cuban cigars Che Guevara sent to Kennedy. I got them from Guevara in Punta Del Este, Uruguay, and I brought them back to the Oval Office. I handed them to the president and he said, "Are they good?" I said, "They're the best." He took one, lit it and said, "You should've smoked the first one."

Che Guevara is still such a controversial figure. What's your take on him, since you knew him?
I think he was a totally committed, dedicated guy. He was perfectly willing to kill in pursuit of his revolutionary goals. It ended badly for him.

Favorite country in Latin America?
I really love Latin America, but to me the most fascinating is Brazil. It's several countries in one. I remember sitting in a canoe with Bobby Kennedy on a river filled with piranhas. He dared me to jump in, and I said I would if he did, so he took off his shirt and jumped in. I followed, and we're swimming, and he says, "You know, piranhas have never been known to bite a U.S. Senator." I said, "Well, I'm not one, so I'm gettin' the hell out."

Funniest president?
Kennedy had the best sense of humor. Johnson was a great storyteller.

If you'd been Felix Frankfurter, would you have changed your name?
[Laughs.] Well, by the time he got on the Supreme Court, it was a little late for that.

Did JFK ever pinch your butt?
Not that I remember. But a lot of things went on in that swimming pool. [Laughs.]

How did you feel about Rob Morrow's portrayal of you in Quiz Show*?*
I thought it was pretty good, but I hated his Boston accent. It was awful.

Was the movie accurate?
As accurate as a movie can be. The timescale was compressed, but it's a faithful re-creation.

What's in the water at Brookline High School that it produced you, Mike Wallace, Conan O'Brien, etc.?
You had a city in which most of the people were second-generation immigrants. They were ambitious.

What did you do when the Red Sox won the World Series?
Celebrated. If I recall, it was with gin.

Most intimidating person you ever met?
Lyndon Johnson. He was 6' 4", just huge. And he'd get into people's personal space. He'd have congressmen and senators shaking in the knees.

Favorite memory of Hickory Hill [Robert Kennedy's home in Washington]?
I once brought Hunter S. Thompson over. Ethel wasn't there and the kids were, and I think she was a little upset.

Most memorable encounter with Jackie Onassis?
[Laughs.] I obviously saw a lot of her, both at the White House and later on in New York, but I don't think I'll answer that for fear of upsetting my wife.

Last question: Is history always written by the victors?
Well, the first draft, at least. ×××

Meet the Locavores

By Elizabeth Bomze Photographs by Matt Teuten

THIS IS A TALE OF TWO CARROTS, one grown in California and one grown in Massachusetts. Both boast strong roots and crisp, billowy tops. Both grew up in nutrient-rich, well-tended soil. And both have done their farmers proud and matured into firm, slender specimens saturated by a brilliant shade of orange. Theoretically, each one would make a welcome contribution to your mise en place, not to mention your soup, root-vegetable mash or crudité platter. The question is, when both are available for the picking, does it matter which one you choose?

If you're chef Tony Maws, the answer is absolutely. You could say ingredient-driven food is this bistrot moderne–trained chef's M.O. He applies all those vogue adjectives about the current farm-to-table revolution—"regional," "sustainable," "organic"—to his from-scratch kitchen practices at Craigie on Main, vowing that when he has a choice to make between a tasty carrot from the West Coast and a tasty carrot from Western Mass., he'll take the New England option. "Food tastes better if it travels less," he claims, "and supporting the local economy is a business practice that feeds itself."

With that in mind, we left the Chilean-grown asparagus, hothouse tomatoes and marigold-tinted oven-stuffer roasters at the supermarket, cut our carbon footprint way back and asked Maws to take us food shopping at the source.

Behold, the contents of our reusable tote bags.

WE ARE OPEN!

Bay End Farm

200 Bournedale Road, Buzzards Bay
508-759-8050
bayendfarm.com
Available at Formaggio Kitchen

We'll take Maws' word for it that his old friends grow the best komatsuna (Japanese mustard spinach) around. He considers these glossy, dark greens (plus the wiry Chinese long beans he pickles and serves alongside fried Nova Scotia smelts) part of his "bread and butter," and sounds like a proud father when he remarks how this self-started, completely organic business "gets better every year." A bonus: Hard-core locavores—or those looking for a Cape Cod vacation—can rent one of two houses on land adjoining the farm.

Eva's Garden

105 Jordan Road, Dartmouth
508-636-5869
Occasionally available at Formaggio Kitchen, Plum Produce and some Whole Foods Markets

Next time you weed the garden, think twice about what you throw away. Chances are you've supped on some of those straggly sprouts at Craigie. Lovage, Thai basil blossoms and anise hyssop (those puffy, blue-violet stalks that look like pipe cleaners) are just a few of the oft-overlooked plants Maws sources from his long-time friend Eva Sommaripa in South Dartmouth. In fact, this potter-turned-organic-herb-cultivator's passion for unconventional flora is just as wild as her garden. "She's completely nuts—and I love that," Maws says. "And her herbs are explosive on the palate."

Grateful Farm

49 Prospect St., Franklin
508-446-5806
gratefulfarm.com
Available at Lionette's Market, Formaggio Kitchen, some Whole Foods Markets and several local farmers' markets

Tim Garboski and Darcy Valantine consider their Franklin farm a small venture, but their local market presence is anything but. Besides coddling crops of exceptional sweet potatoes, Brussels sprouts, tomatillos and tomatoes—Maws calls their produce "soulful"—the couple peddle their organically grown wares at five Boston-area markets, including one in their own town that would've folded last year were it not for a little elbow grease and a lot of motivation from Garboski himself. In Franklin, a little soul goes a long way.

MEM Tea Imports

316 Highland Ave., Somerville
617-627-9500
Available at Kookoo Café, Christina's and Cardullo's

Maws isn't the only chef around town brewing Mark Mooradian's exquisite leaves—Oleana, Mike and Patty's and Crema Café are among those who also trade tea from this Somerville-based purveyor—but we'll bet he's the only one serving it in shot glasses. Don't be misled; proper pots of Himalayan Darjeeling and Earl Grey are hot items on Craigie's drink menu, but it won't take more than one spoonful of jasmine- or rooibos-infused panna cotta to prove that he's steeply invested in Mooradian's leaf industry.

New Deal Fish Market, Inc.

622 Cambridge St., Cambridge
617-876-8227
newdealfishmarket.com

Carl Fantasia and his family have been reeling in the freshest catch at their East Cambridge storefront for more than 80 years. According to Maws, this place is the real deal when it comes to top-quality seafood. "It's not just the typical WASPy Boston food you get in most markets," he says. Besides their sashimi-grade bigeye tuna, baby octopus and no-nonsense advice, Maws is hooked on New Deal's Portuguese sardines and exceptional selection of Canadian salt cod.

Pio Angelini

Ashmont
Available at Formaggio Kitchen

Your average field tomato doesn't get much respect these days—no stripes, no wild colors, no heirloom pedigree—unless it's plucked from Pio Angelini's garden. In-the-know chefs around town can't help but wax breathy, Neruda-esque verse about this older guy growing old-school, red field tomatoes and sun-sweetened berries. "He picks them in the morning and delivers them to you in the afternoon, still warm from the sun," Maws raves. Put bluntly, "They're freaking unbelievable," and no relation to those "on-the-vine" imposters.

Rao's Coffee

305 Russell St., Hadley
413-642-4423
raoscoffee.com
Available at Russo's

Amherstians are abuzz over the above-average cuppa joe brewed here from globally sourced, house-roasted beans like Ethiopian Yirgacheffe and Costa Rican La Minita. Maws is just one of several restaurant chefs who works with the company to create a custom blend—appropriately tagged the Craigie Blend—to accompany sweet endings like white-corn grits or tea-infused panna cottas (see MEM Tea Imports).

Siena Farms

113 Haynes Road, Sudbury
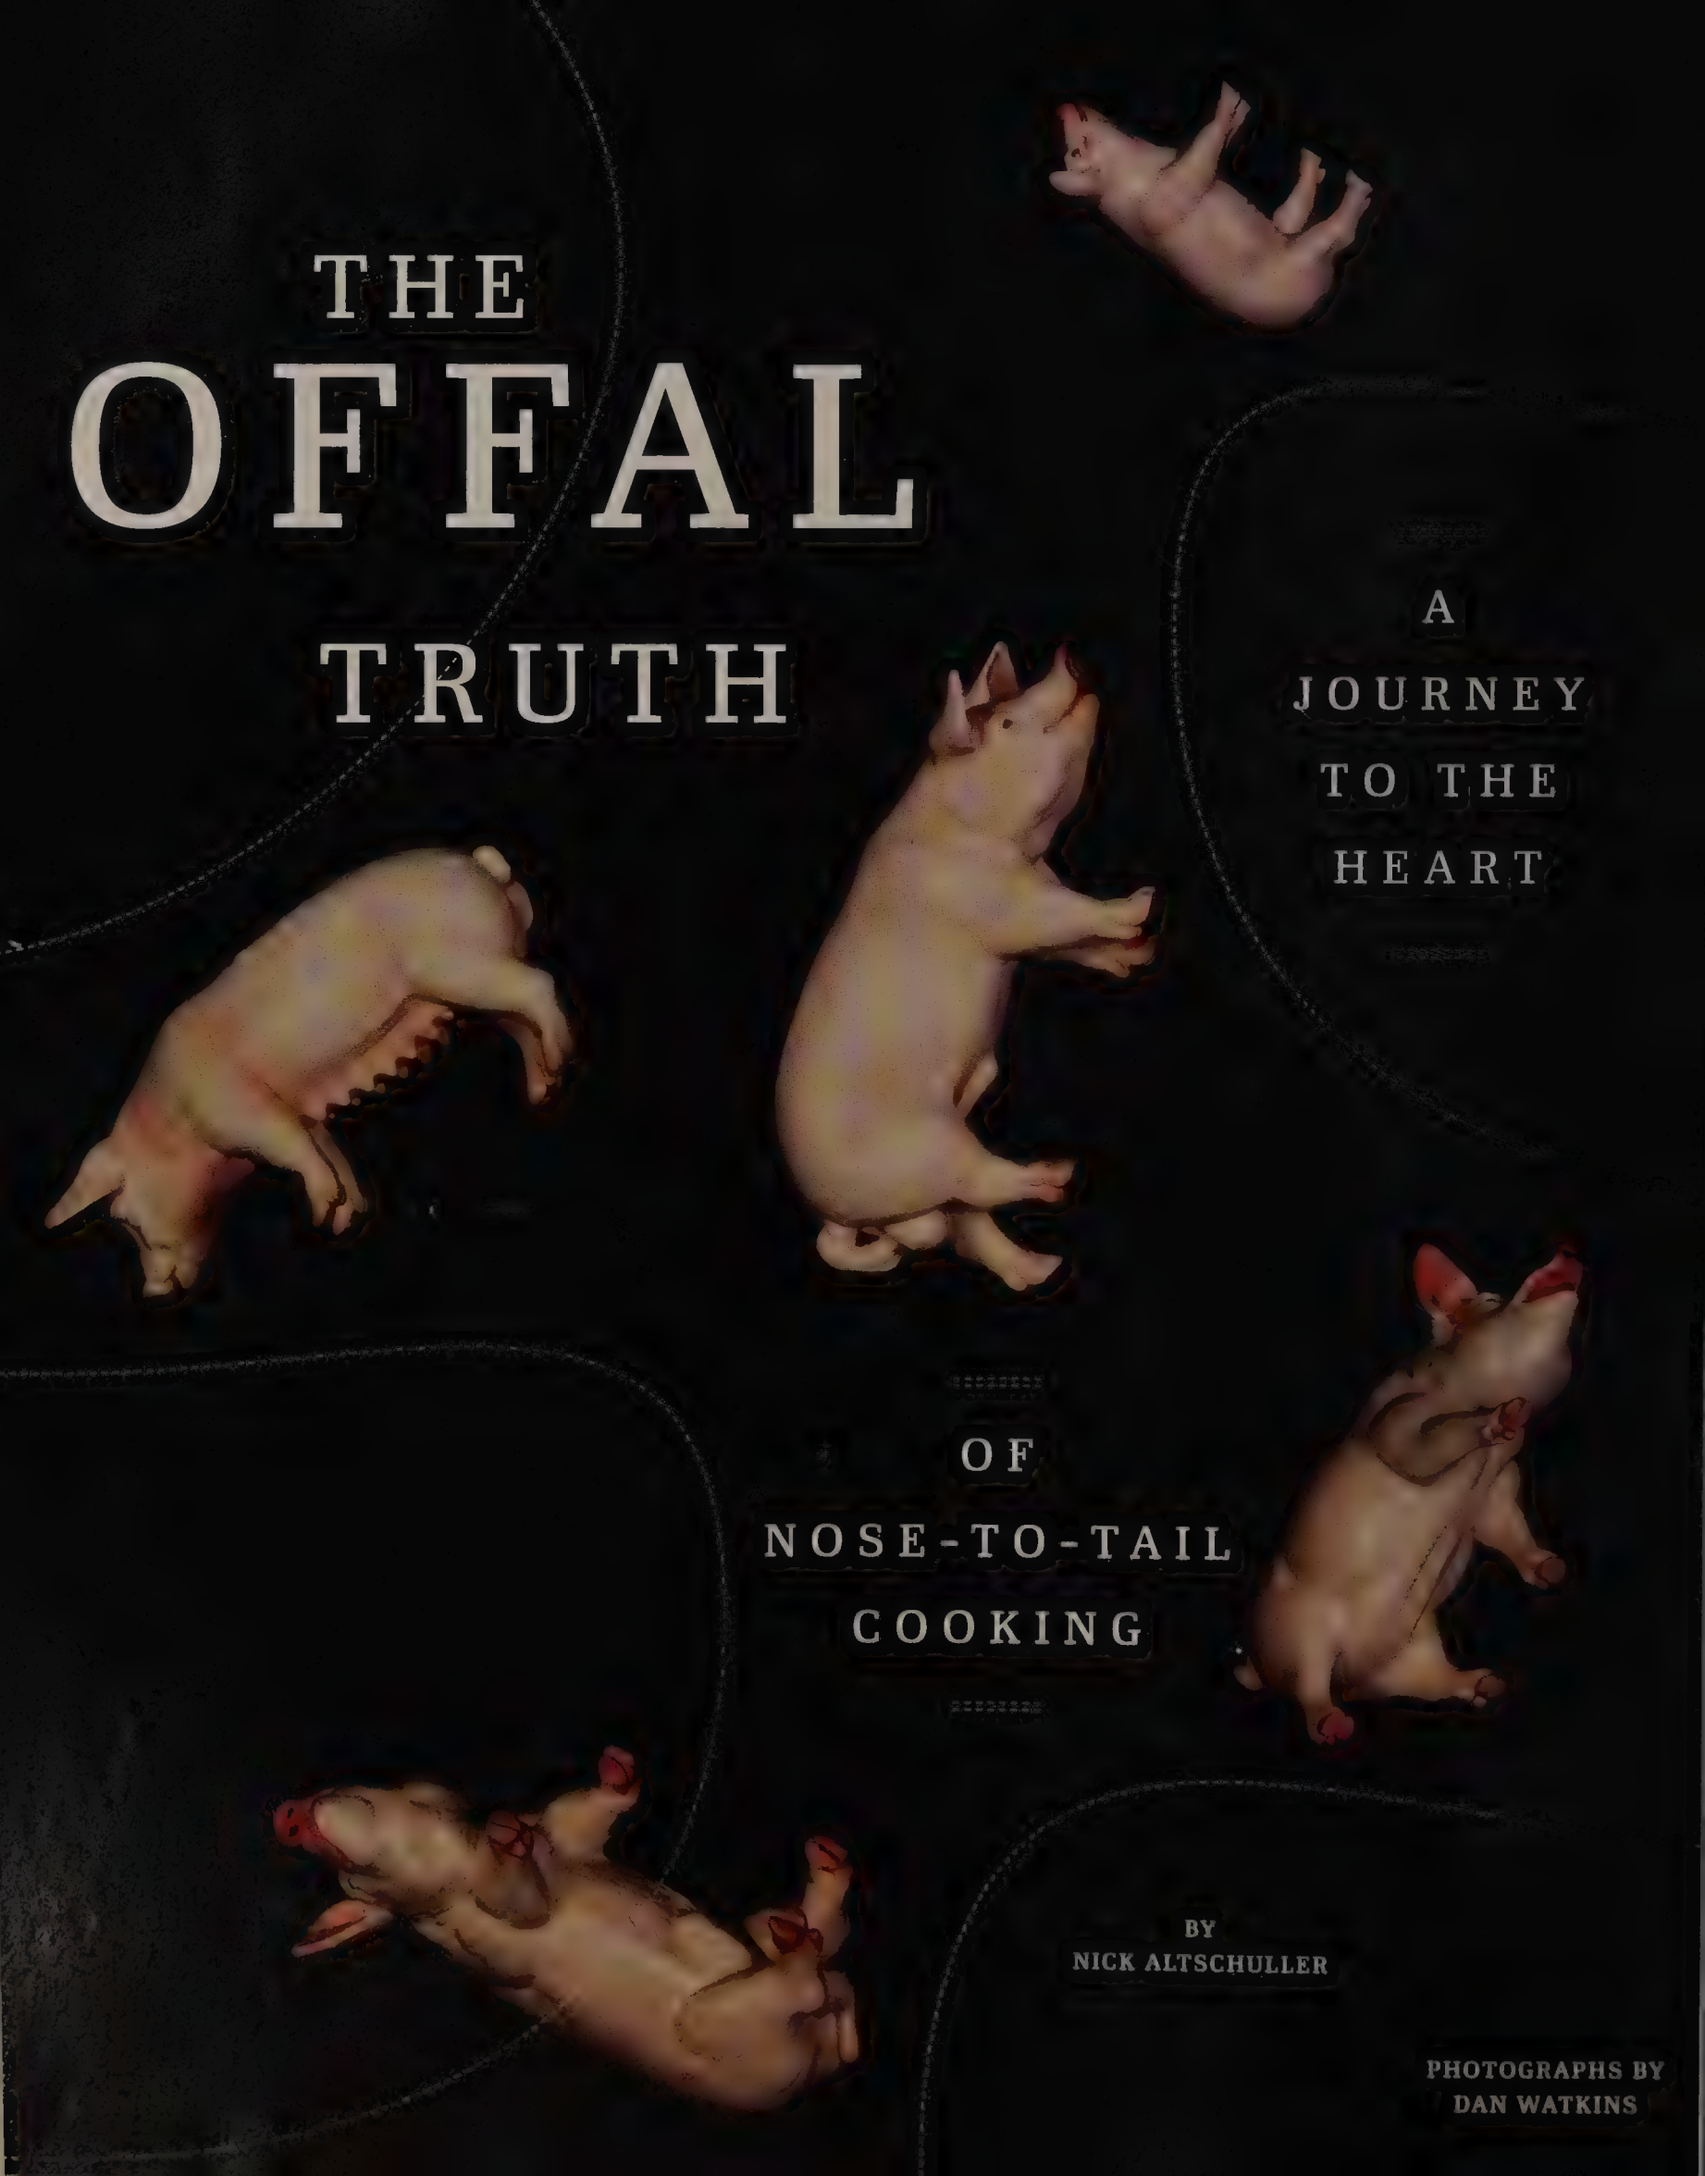
sienafarms.com

Frequenters of the Copley Square Farmers' Market rely on farmer Chris Kurth for his "fresh-fresh" greens, French breakfast radishes and husk cherries. But the Sudbury-based grower has another claim to fame: He's married to Oleana chef-owner Ana Sortun. "That connection is always helpful," says Maws. "He's also very honest; he tells you when his mesclun stinks." Even better, his potatoes and fava beans are first-rate.

Vermont Quality Meats

28 Allen St., Rutland, Vt.
802-747-5950
vtquaitymeats.com
Available at the Butcher Shop

Braised pigs' tails; rabbit terrine; a bone marrow-enriched burger. Nose-to-tail eating only sells if you start with the best, and for that, Maws looks north to his friends in Rutland, Vt. Theirs is the kind of quality meat your grandparents reminisce about: "The pigs have real fat!" Maws exclaims. "The beef is very lean—the way it should be—and the chickens are phenomenal." (Suckling pig, quail, pork belly and goat are also on their menu.) It's a costly commitment for Maws, but for food with this much "flavor, character and integrity," he gladly pays top dollar.



Verrill Farm

11 Wheeler Road, Concord
978-369-4494
verrillfarm.com

Stephen Verrill and his family were selling corn and tomatoes from a roadside produce stall one day after a fire destroyed their Concord farmstand last September, but that's not the only reason Maws "tips his cap" to them. For years, he's admired not only their produce—particularly radishes, spring asparagus and sweet corn—but also their business practice. Regulars count on a jug of Shaw Farm milk and a round of bloomy Hubbardston blue chèvre from Westfield Farm—just two of several smaller businesses housed under their soon-to-be-rebuilt roof. "These are great people doing nothing flashy," Maws says. "They're as local as local can be." ×××

THE OFFAL TRUTH

A JOURNEY TO THE HEART OF NOSE-TO-TAIL COOKING

BY NICK ALTSCHULLER

PHOTOGRAPHS BY DAN WATKINS

ALL I NEEDED TO know about food I learned in the first grade. Well, my second attempt at the first grade. (I'm a slow learner.)

It was International Day, and each classroom was decorated as a different part of the world. I was in Central America, picking around a plate of regional cuisine and pushing aside what looked like a fleshy miniature watermelon. At eight years old, and thus capable of being terrified by fruit, I left the slice uneaten, save for one fleeting bite as we were ushered toward the door. It was delicious, and as we single-filed away, I stole glances back at what years later I would learn was a guava. They probably told us at the time, but as I said, focus was not my forte. But I had learned my lesson: TRY EVERYTHING.

Toro chef Jamie Bissonnette has his own formative food moments. "When I was a kid, you know when you go to the store with your mom, and you're sitting in the front of the carriage with your feet hanging down, and in the deli area, they have those big tubs of pickles?" asks Bissonnette, positing a highly nostalgic culinary question. "My mom would get one of those nice dill pickles, and she'd buy liverwurst for home, and that would be my snack. Some kids would get an apple, and I loved liverwurst."

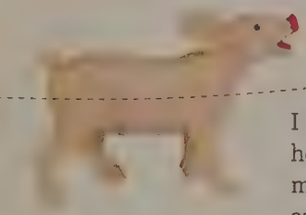
Preferring spiced liver sausage to, say, cookies is what separates future chefs from the rest of us. Most people don't become straight-edge, punk-band roadies or vegan martial artists either, but that's what Bissonnette did, embarking on a course that took him to culinary school, Paris and a second decisive taste.

Good chefs can cook animal proteins, and all chefs must taste their work. It's the spell-check of the food world. As one mentor told Bissonnette, if he was going to cook meat, he was going to have to eat meat. So he hopped off the veggie wagon and soon developed a taste for the hard stuff.

Back in Boston, Bissonnette turned Eastern Standard into a charcuterie hotspot. At KO Prime, he put brains, tails and hearts on the menu. Now at Toro, he's plating dishes like tripe with blood sausage.

Great chefs can prepare the off cuts. "Especially in Paris, there's a big emphasis on using everything," says Bissonnette. "Anybody can learn how to make trout almondine, anybody can learn how to make a fritter. You're following directions. Not everyone can make blood sausage. A lot of chefs judge other chefs by how good their blood sausage is."

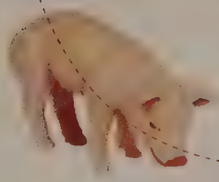
I've ruined Jimmy Dean's. But I can, sometimes, follow directions. So Bissonnette would be my guide through offal. The term is shortened from "off fall" and refers to the pieces that drop from a carcass during butchering. It's the stuff regular consumers don't want, the items chefs can make delicious and the parts I would probably mess up. But there's a whole lot of food I've never eaten, and I want to try everything.



HEAD

FOR MY JOURNEY in nose-to-tail cooking, I chose to stick with pig. Calves and lambs tend to offer the best offal, as babies are delicious, but I'm a completist. I figured that I'd consumed most of the usual cuts of pork, so, having no sense of scale or reality, I decided to buy a whole hog and eat what I'd been missing along the way.

If cooking shows are food porn, then processing manuals are food snuff. Poring over instructions like "I recommend a head-up hang so that you don't have the 'leaping intestines' problem," I realized I was way out of my league. The Ted Nugent method would have to be replaced with something in a more serial-killer aesthetic.



A head in a vacuum-sealed bag is a hell of a sight. It doesn't exactly whet your appetite, but it sure piques your curiosity. It's also fun to store one in your freezer and ask guests to grab you some ice. I scored one from Specialty Foods Boston, which orders meat from La Quercia in Iowa. As the subject of a recent New York Times article and with its products popping all over Boston, La Quercia is the heavyweight champ of domestic artisanal meat. But sitting by a Toro window, staring at that frosty anvil of flesh and bone, it's dead eyes blankly staring back, all I felt was pressure. And my complete ignorance of what to do next.

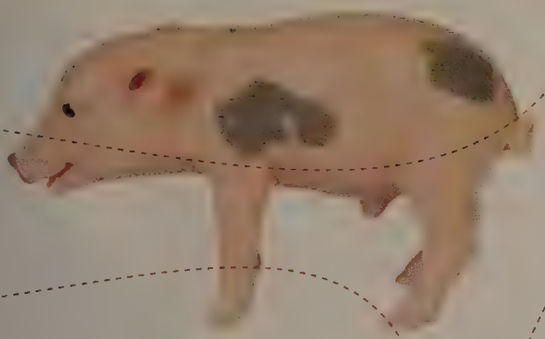
"The hardest part for me about cooking a pig head is that I often don't have a pot big enough," Bissonnette told me. "Other than that, it's pretty easy."

The head didn't fit in anything from my cupboard. I tried to shove the skull-shaped peg into the round hole of my steamer, but that didn't work. I considered metallurgy until my friend Josh came through with a cauldron he borrowed from his father. You could put a toddler in there. So with the hard part over, all I had to do was throw the head in with some vegetables and boil the thing for six hours.

Of course, there were unforeseen problems. First, the pig-head feast was planned for Super Bowl Sunday. As it was preceded by Saturday night, I didn't actually start cooking until the afternoon. Second, it takes a lot of water to boil a toddler. It took an hour and a half for the water to begin to bubble, so I was even further behind schedule. Third, preparing offal means fewer hands in the kitchen. "I'd help you, man," Josh said, staring at an ear poking through the water like a dorsal fin, "but I don't think I can."

Lastly, as it was the Super Bowl, having enough food wasn't really an issue. There were pizzas, nachos and chicken wings, so by the time the head was ready, nobody was eager to approach it. "That's a good piece of food right there," stated my buddy Bill. "If we were starving, we'd be fighting over it. But we're not, so..."

"I'm a little freaked out," another friend admitted. "Actually staring at the snout while picking meat off is a little disconcerting." True, it's odd at first, but that feeling speaks to the importance of offal—there's no hiding from the truth. Steak is faceless, but stomach you know came from an animal. You can dip pieces of head in sea salt or salsa verde, but thinking of a skull like a rib—just another vehicle for meat—takes a different mindset.



"If I came to your house for a Super Bowl party, and you had a pig's head sitting on the table at room temperature, I would grab the ear off immediately and start eating," Bissonnette enthused.

The ear wasn't for me, though. It wasn't so much the leathery feel or the cartilage snap. I think it was watching them slough off when I pulled the head out of the pot. In the end, I agreed with my friend John, who said, "If you had pulled the meat off and served it to me in a sandwich, I would have said, 'This is awesome.'" So the next day I shredded the meat, which tasted a lot like roast beef, and made spaghetti Bolognese. Fortified by the head and emboldened by leftover beer, I used the remnants to help mark off my checklist.

(Incidentally, cold eyeball tastes like the nub of a turkey leg.)

> "The hardest part about cooking a pig head is that I often don't have a pot big enough."

HEART AND LIVER

"TREAT THE HEART just like a muscle," Bissonnette advises, delivering both straightforward cooking instructions and the most cynical Valentine's Day wishes I've ever heard.

I really wanted to nail the organs, as they came from Peter Merrill at the Codman Community Farm in Lincoln. I've met his pigs; they're jolly and energetic like mammoth Labradors. I've also been to Groton's Blood Farm—amazingly a family name—and seen what they become. Two hundred pounds of live affection turns into 150 lbs of frozen meat wheeled out in a metal carriage. After carrying a garbage bag full of an animal that once nuzzled your leg, you want to show the proper respect when you sear its heart in a skillet.

Supporting local farms is another important aspect of eating offal. "When somebody from River Rock Farm sells most of their animals to Specialty, and they say, 'Hey, I've got a couple hearts and a couple tongues. Nobody else in the city wants them, do you?' Yeah, I want 'em," says Bissonnette. "Because now River Rock just sold 100 percent of their usable product, and they're going to stay in business and be that much more successful."

Bissonnette's instructions were easy: Just marinate the heart, cut it in half, cook it to medium, then serve sliced at room temperature. Of course, for the uninitiated, issues arise once the organ is on the cutting board. A pig's heart isn't that much bigger than a human's, and holding one in your hand evokes unsettling thoughts of mortality. Also, no knife was needed as the pig heart just cleaved in two, which made me worry about my own ticker's structural integrity. But the difficult part is just telling when a heart is cooked. This is an organ whose sole job is to pump blood, and days later the leftovers were still bleeding.

But it tasted good, like steak with an odd segmented quality, the fibers popping apart as I chewed. My true success, however, came in getting a curious vegetarian to take a bite.

"It's not gross," she said, which I chose to take as a compliment. "Why don't more people eat this?"

"Most people are kinda put off by it," I explained.

"Yeah, but people eat snails and fish eggs and stuff."

It was a salient question, so I pondered it for a while, dipped my fork in barbeque sauce and finished the rest of a lower ventricle.

I was alone when it came time to fry the liver, which was good because screaming tends to take the romance out of cooking. The thawed liver looked like a jelly fish made of blood, and I didn't know if I'd be able to follow through with Bissonnette's instructions to cut away the outer skin and tranche cut the organ into half-inch slices. Thankfully, the liver came pre-sliced, which saved me from trying to grip the slippery blood bag and from having to figure out what tranche cutting is.

Bissonnette warned me of pork liver's gaminess and first recommended I make sausage, but I had enough trouble finding a pot for the head. I wouldn't know where to begin with a meat grinder. So it was liver and onions, with floured and pan-fried slices accompanied by something familiar to coat my tongue and assuage my fears—bacon. A buttery, vinegary mix of caramelized onions and pork belly brought a needed acidic element to the plate. The slices had the texture and richness of chicken livers, but in man-sized portions. It's a flavor that needs to be cut with a broccoli rabe, covered in mashed potatoes or complemented by a friendly, familiar pig product to chase fears of the unfamiliar away.

My true success, however, came in getting a curious vegetarian to take a bite.

FEET AND TAILS

HEADING BACK TO THE OUTER realms of offal, I received a tub of feet and tails from the wonder emporium that is the Toro freezer. Cross-sectioned, the feet were part meal, part anatomy lesson and easy to prepare. I screwed up anyway.

The plan was to season the feet, sandwich them between two layers of onions, garlic and leeks, then put them in a 200-degree oven overnight. The result would be a gelatinous block—"You're going to be able to bounce a quarter off of it," Bissonnette enthused—that I would dig the meat out of before preparing a pig-foot roulade, Milanese, schnitzel or other words that sounded very impressive when I was bragging to friends.

Unfortunately, my fire alarms are a bit overprotective. Like three obsessive-compulsives, they're constantly worried that the oven is on, and even a quick 20-minute roast can send them into a frenzy. Ten to 12 hours was out of the question. But I have a slow cooker, and Bissonnette said that would be perfect.

A good chef doesn't blame his tools; he blames his mentor. After 12 hours, what I had was a wet-foot mélange. The meat was too soft to roll, and though additional cooling may have provided the solidification I was looking for, I was hungry and curious, so my friend Al and I just dug in with forks.

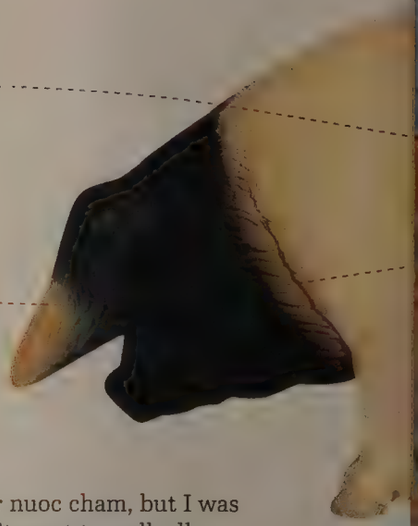
"Succulent and tender, with a hint of leek," said Al, suddenly an obnoxious Food Network host.

"You want some more?"

"Yeah, get some hoof on there."

Jackassery aside, the feet were tasty. The next night, I improvised and spooned the meat and veg over polenta. Bissonnette's recipes would've worked better, considering the lack of muscle and abundance of fatty skin, but sitting in front of a steaming bowl of stew and sucking on a hoof, I was well-satisfied.

Fittingly, I ended with tails, and the results were my greatest offal success.



After a quick browning in the oven, I put the seasoned tails in a saucepan with sautéed garlic, onions, carrots and thyme, then poured in a bottle of wine. Bissonnette prefers Godello. Craigie on Main's Tony Maws uses Beaujolais. As most chefs are influenced by their mothers, I chose malbec, which was on sale.

When the wine had reduced, I covered the tails with chicken stock, sealed the lid and set everything to a low simmer for two hours. After it cooled and spent the night in the fridge, I ended up with a bowl of mottled red jelly. It was probably exactly what I wanted for the feet, so although this was an entirely different recipe, I chalked it up as a success. With some reheating, I could've eaten them right away, but Bissonnette had suggestions if I wanted to get fancy, and I did.

After straining the goop, I reduced it to create a basting liquid that put a sticky glaze over the tails. The next important step was a condiment. "What a lot of chefs don't think of when cooking offal is they don't balance the flavors," Bissonnette explains. "It's really easy to make tails and feet rich. I use the fried clam analogy. A fried clam is great, but if you have salt and lemon and put some cherry peppers with them, that makes them even better."

"Once you eat my calves' brains, you'll go, 'Holy crap, that's why he cooks them—because they're delicious.'"

He suggested a gremolata or nuoc cham, but I was feeling creative, and also didn't want to walk all the way back to the grocery store. So in a blender, I mixed up what I will call Nick's gremolatish, made from fried garlic, parsley, truffle salt, olive oil, fish sauce and pieces of wooden spoon. It's powerful stuff, and I thought I'd need it, as the finished tails looked like dismembered, distended purple fingers.

Thankfully, after digging in, the similes changed. Tails are like fatty chicken wings, except with more movable parts. As you go, bits of skeleton pop off like calcified Legos, but the sight isn't unnerving. It's more of a way to tally your progress. After three tails, there was a tidy pile of fat and bone. Scanning the carnage, I felt like an urbane ogre, some beast of primitive hunger that had learned to turn slaughter into something sophisticated.

"We're not going to have a restaurant that's going to be all offal and charcuterie. It'll never work," Bissonnette declares. But offal options are increasing, and for any adventurous diner or daring home cook, there's an abundance of new tastes to be had. And to those still clinging to the anonymous lips and bungholes of bologna, Bissonnette says, "It's a shock value that people need to get over. I don't cook calves' brains because I want to say I cook calves' brains. Once you eat my calves' brains, you'll go, 'Holy crap, that's why he cooks them—because they're delicious.'" He's not kidding. I've tried them. Life's too short to let a plate pass you by. ✖✖✖

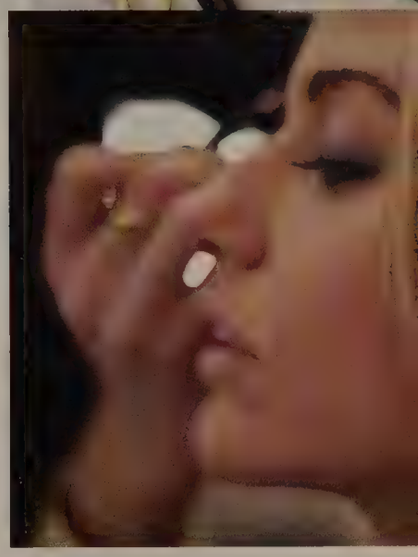
Perfectly Finished

By Amanda Knorr
Photographs by Michael Piazza



When you walk into Sarra in South Boston, you might not know you're in a makeup studio. You might not even be able to spot the makeup artist. And that's the way owner Lauren Genatossio likes it. Because when you're cosmetically confused, the last thing you want is 5,000 makeup products staring you in the face and a person in all-black greeting you at the door. Genatossio keeps it low-key and elegant, with a flokati wool carpet, leather chairs and mirrors with the kind of lighting you'd kill to have in a department-store dressing room.

As soon as I meet her, a jean and thermal-clad Genatossio sits me down for a quick tutorial on makeup and puts the beauty editor in me to shame. I'm using too much under-eye concealer, and I've been blushing the apples of my cheeks, not the bones. How could I have been so blind? But she assures me that once I get the basics down, the rest is easy.

The fundamentals are what Genatossio strives to teach all her first-time customers. They're the most difficult to master, but once you can even out your skin tone, find the right colors and perfect their application, the rest is about having fun, she says. Her take on wardrobes is similar: Invest in the essentials, find the pieces that work best and refine their execution—then fill in the gaps where needed.

Once we're done with Makeup 101, the personal-image stylist describes how to get the head-to-toe look:

Improper Bostonian: How does your job as a makeup artist relate to your wardrobe choices?
Lauren Genatossio: The feel of clothes is just like me with makeup. The feel of the foundation and texture of lipstick matters in how [each] performs, and I feel the same way about fabrics in clothing. I mean you live in this stuff. Between that and your sheets, it's your life.

What are the style rules you live by?
Not letting the industry take you where it wants to go. It's all out there for you, and it's up to you to edit it down. And I'm telling you: comfort. There's not a day you're going to feel sexy or beautiful or good if you're not comfortable. I made a conscious decision to be true to me.

How about style rules for work?
I never wear all black, an industry standard for most makeup artists. It always appears too uniform-like to me. You might as well wear a nametag that says, "Hello, my name is makeup artist." I much prefer working with other neutrals like white, gray, camel and brown, or bringing a little color into the mix.

Let's talk designers.
Knowing your body dictates designers you'll be drawn to. I'm 4' 11", so for me to feel good it's got to really work. It can't overtake me, and so much of fashion right now is difficult silhouettes. So I go for the classics—ladylike and curvy. I tend to be a Dolce & Gabbana or Cavalli dress person. That's my aesthetic. I tend to be a really good investor in pieces that I could wear 10 years ago and I can wear now. I often go for timeless silhouettes and classics from that designer.

I appreciate your expensive taste!
It's not always the most expensive stuff, but it's a level of quality and performance that I do look for. That's probably why I have nice shoes. Once you feel [what they're like], it's hard to go back. It's not my fault! I'm a size 5—I was forced to buy expensive shoes! There's not a huge market for 5's at the middle-of-the-road stores.

"My friends who don't spend a lot on clothes are always shopping. I shop less because I buy more fulfilling pieces."

So shoes are your accessory of choice?
I'm the most adventurous with my shoes. Because I'm vertically challenged and have this silhouette where I can't try every trend, I go trendy with shoes. I love Giuseppe Zanotti's. I'd wear them with a white T-shirt and jeans—they're a statement piece. They're like jewelry to me. I almost use shoes like jewelry more than jewelry. Shoes are how I change my mood.

How about shoes for working in?
I absolutely cannot live without my perfectly worn-in Harley-Davidson motorcycle boots or my shiny-gold Puma sneakers. I just had to part with them, and I am on a mad search for a new pair!

Any other obsessions?
I have been the girl wearing a dress since junior high school to any [event]. You should have a dress for every mood.

What is a typical work ensemble?
When working on a photo shoot or at one of the makeup studios, I like to feel polished and pulled together, but I need to be comfortable enough to last on my feet all day. Great jeans allow me to achieve this balance, and I love wearing different washes and cuts to vary my look. I must have over 40 pairs of jeans, ranging from skinny to boot-cut, wide-leg to high-waisted, all perfect for pairing with basics like tanks, tees, thermals, tailored shirts, blazers and comfy sweaters.

How do you avoid wasteful spending?
Buy good stuff. And use it up. Put your money toward the right stuff that looks good on you. My friends who don't spend a lot on clothes are always shopping. I shop less because I buy more fulfilling pieces. I don't want for anything. My friends who have drawers full of stuff never think they have anything to wear. It's an investment, but there's a reason why it feels so good. I don't love it because of the name; I love it because of the way it fits me, performs and feels. And if it hits on all those levels, then you know you have an investment piece.

What's your take on shopping during a recession?
A recession is the time to think about quality. How is your money working for you? What are you going to show for it when you come out of it? It's magnified right now. You have to make your money work that much harder for you. You have to get things to be that much more impactful.

How do you find the balance between spending and saving?
It's my cheapest things that I regret buying. But you have to find ways to spend only on what really does it for you. In Boston, everybody wants to spend on the bag. Because the bag is with you every outfit and everyday. It's like carrying money around on your shoulder. But maybe it's a canvas bag from Gap, and then you can have three or four dresses that serve you the whole season—rather than putting into just one bag. Nobody would know some of the things I spent the most on.

Anything you refuse to splurge on?
Underwear. [Laughs.] My poor husband. I would so much rather have clothes than a La Perla nightgown. I love Gap's drawstring, cotton pajama pants. The basics. The more boy, the better. I don't need that layer of lace to feel sexy because I'm wearing Cavalli on the outside!

Anything you refuse to buy?
[Anything] fussy. I can't feel fragile. And I can't feel like if I spill something on my outfit, my life is over. It has to feel active.

But wouldn't you be nervous to spill on an expensive outfit?
I don't save anything [for special occasions]. You're special. What are you waiting for? Everywhere you go is an opportunity to feel great, have more fun and express yourself. I wouldn't hold back because I spent a lot or it wasn't a big enough occasion. I'd wear Dolce & Gabbana to my in-laws for dinner—I really would.

Do you keep certain dresses in mind for different events?
Because my job allows me the freedom to dress casually, I really look forward to rocking a great dress for almost any occasion. People always give me a hard time for wearing so many dresses, but I never regret going that extra mile, even if I am the most dressed up. I always search for the most comfortable dress that still makes a bold statement. ×××

"Sundresses. I would wear a dress to the beach over a bathing suit. Where someone would insert shorts, I'd wear a dress. What remains the same is the shape. It won't be a babydoll, but a lightweight cotton, [like] a stretchy Missoni. I'd go totally fitted ¾ length."

BOCH 'N' ROLL

SHEDDING THE business suit and opting for gas-station chic, car mogul Ernie Boch Jr. spends his downtime rocking out on the guitar in his band, Ernie and the Automatics. But for the Berklee alum, music is more than a hobby. The Automatics include former members of Boston—drummer Sib Hashian and guitarist Barry Goudreau—and have opened for legendary acts like BB King and Chuck Berry. How well do classic rockers mesh with an automotive gazillionaire? "No egos," says Goudreau. "Everybody's been around the block a few times, and we appreciate the good things. It's just been a ball." The six-member ensemble performs in venues across Massachusetts in upcoming weeks to promote their first album, Low Expectations. So come on down!

Coraline ★★★ Neil Gaiman's psychologically spiky novella gets a fairly faithful rendering from gifted stop-motion animator Henry Selick, who previously tickled eyeballs with his beloved The Nightmare Before Christmas and the terrific but underrated James and the Giant Peach. Voiced without much gusto by Dakota Fanning, our title lass is a neglected only child who happens upon a secret tunnel leading to an alternate universe where doppelgängers of her distracted parents are suddenly affectionate and doting. Of course, they do have buttons for eyes, but that's probably the least creepy thing about them. A psychedelic trip down a dark rabbit hole of youthful anxieties, Coraline is never less than a visual marvel, even when Gaiman's leaps of dream-logic become more head-scratching than mind-blowing. If you have the option, I'd check out the 3-D version, which wisely foregoes the usual gimmicky gotcha effects and instead uses the wondrous Real D technology to further envelop you in Selick's richly detailed, carefully rendered world. Also, it's nice to see a heroic cat, for a change. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Curious Case of Benjamin Button ★★ David Fincher, the gifted and sardonic director of Fight Club and Zodiac, goes Forrest Gump in this shockingly syrupy take on an old F. Scott Fitzgerald short story. Borrowing the premise and little else from the original work, Button stars Brad Pitt as a quizzical fellow born as a elderly man who ages backwards as the film grinds on. And on. Some gorgeous, state-of-the-art digital effects have been invented to place Pitt's face on all sorts of incongruous bodies, but besides existing as a technical marvel, there's little point to the proceedings. Screenwriter Eric Roth seems to have recycled his Forrest Gump script, changing a few names but keeping the central notion of a bumpkin in a doomed romance naively wandering through blunt historical signposts with a surfeit of cornpone aphorisms. There's no actual conflict as we wait for Pitt to grow young and die, just a lot of pretty pictures, plus the visceral nagging disappointment that a talent as subversive as Fincher's stooped to helming shiny Hollywood sap. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Defiance ★★ Director Edward Zwick, perpetrator of such prestigious snores as Blood Diamond and The Last Samurai, has an uncanny knack for sucking all the excitement out of fascinating real-life stories. Zwick strikes again with Defiance, a stodgy, lugubrious account of the Bielski brothers, who escaped from the Nazi occupation into the Belarusian forest, where they built a makeshift village, teamed up with Russian resistance fighters and protected hundreds from the Holocaust. Daniel Craig stars as Tuvia, who humorlessly assumes command of the refugee camp after his reckless brother Zus (Liev Schreiber) heads out to fight with the Russians. Billy Elliot's Jamie Bell plays another sibling, and there's even an ill-conceived love story tossed in for good measure. In typical Zwick fashion, the over-scaled, curiously bloodless action sequences lack any sense of urgency, and the details of a compelling tale are smothered in Hollywood cheese. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Friday the 13th ★ How lame do you have to be not to improve on the original? Michael Bay's Platinum Dunes is a company devoted to remaking low-rent, brand-name horror flicks by pumping up the budgets and glossing over any rough edges that made the originals interesting in the first place. Not that the Friday the 13th movies ever had much going for them, but at least their semipornographic incompetence provided an aura of danger that's missing from this overworked rehash. Mixing up the first, second and third installments of the unimaginative series, Marcus Nispel's version returns to Camp Crystal Lake, where that lumbering guy in the hockey mask is still hacking away at dumb teenagers who are foolish enough to have sex. Director Nispel performed a similar hatchet-job on Bay's desecration of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre and can't keep this thin material in motion for very long, rebooting itself whenever Jason runs out of kids to kill. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Frost/Nixon ★★ ½ In refashioning Peter Morgan's smash 2006 play for the big screen, director Ron Howard made a wise move casting original stars Michael Sheen and Frank Langella. This picture has a ton of problems, but at the very least, Sheen's sly performance as seemingly callow chat-show host David Frost and Langella's towering Tricky Dick have been preserved on film for posterity. Morgan's play positioned Frost's 1977 televised in-

SHADES OF GRAY

Changing genres, director James Gray finds new strength.

Two Lovers
★★★½
Starring Joaquin Phoenix, Gwyneth Paltrow, Vinessa Shaw, Isabella Rossellini and Elias Koteas. Written by James Gray and Richard Menello. Directed by Gray. At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.

2929 Productions 2008

A WASH IN ROMANTIC ambivalence and pained, inarticulated yearning, director James Gray's roiling new melodrama, Two Lovers, should by all rights be considered ridiculous. And while I concede that this is fairly absurd and overwrought stuff, I also found it impossible not to be swept up in the film's sincerity, tickled by its humor and dazzled by Gray's lush stretches of cinematic elegance.

Joaquin Phoenix stars, delivering his farewell performance—at least according to that Andy Kaufman shtick he's been pulling on talk shows. (I don't believe any of it for a second.) Here he plays Leonard Kraditor, a heartsick, bumbling mess who has recently moved back in with his parents to the insular Jewish community of Brighton Beach. We hear overtures of a bad breakup and subsequent suicidal attempts. Leonard even hurls himself into Sheepshead Bay before the opening credits have unspooled, only to crawl out and head home for dinner.

He's an odd duck, but also quite funny and vulnerable at unexpected moments. This is Phoenix's third collaboration with Gray, and the two have clearly established a level of comfort that allows the actor to go for broke. It's brave, marvelous work, and as Phoenix pushes his mumbled Brando-isms and sideways line readings, you're never quite sure what he's going to do next.

Ready to hand over their thriving dry-cleaning empire, Leonard's folks can't help playing matchmaker for their wayward son and constantly invite an important business partner's daughter to the house for all sorts of awkward family occasions. Sandra (Vinessa Shaw) is sexy, stable and inexplicably captivated by Leonard. (What such a put-together gal sees in this cuckoo is a question the film never gets around to answering.) Leonard likes her just fine, but he's distracted.

There's a blonde shiksa goddess (Gwyneth Paltrow) in an apartment upstairs who sticks out like a sore thumb in this ethnically hermetic community. Michelle is the mistress of a hotshot Manhattan lawyer and, for all intents and purposes, a walking disaster. Finally ditching her boring Grace Kelly routine, Paltrow tears into the role with a grit we haven't seen since her early days in Hard Eight or Flesh and Bone. Michelle is druggy, erratic and altogether mesmerizing, and it's love at first sight for bewildered young Leonard.

Paltrow tears into the role with a grit we haven't seen since her early days in Hard Eight or Flesh and Bone.

Adapted from Dostoyevsky's "White Nights," Two Lovers boasts a brazenly schematic framework. Obviously Sandra represents stability, responsibility and a long, quiet future in the old neighborhood, while Michelle personifies the reckless moment, fits of passion and childish notions of a bohemian life. In many ways, Two Lovers could even be considered a remake of Gray's last feature, We Own the Night, which starred Phoenix as another prodigal son, dabbling in drug deals and nightclub shenanigans to break free from his family of career cops.

Gray's previous pictures have all been stilted crime dramas—well-made but typically done in by a sense of solemnity and the feeling that he's trying too hard. Ditching the genre conventions has worked wonders for the filmmaker. Two Lovers is looser and far more alive than anything he's done before.

There's a richness to his depiction of the neighborhood, with sharp insights on the class divide and unexpected bursts of humor from a colorful supporting cast. (Isabella Rossellini, in particular, delivers a droll performance as Leonard's asphyxiating mother.)

Gray and cinematographer Joaquín Baca-Asay are old-school, favoring the long-take, classical compositions of vintage Coppola and '70s European art cinema. But there's always something erupting within the confines of these rigidly designed shots, whether it's Phoenix pulling out the stops for a breakdancing bonanza or Paltrow's over-the-top, breast-baring declarations of adoration. Two Lovers conjures the heedless rush of true romance, and yet somehow the movie remains focused enough to question how much of it is just immature delusion.

You may find yourself pondering Gray's closing shot for quite some time, wondering if it's Leonard's triumph or his entombment. ✖✖✖

terviews with Nixon as a David and Goliath battle, a belated national catharsis in which the wily interrogator tripped the disgraced former president into something close to a mea culpa. Where Howard errs is exactly where this terminally dull filmmaker always errs: He treats his audience like imbeciles. We've got all the makings of a brilliant psychodrama playing out in the loaded glares and strategic statements of Sheen and Langella, yet Howard constantly cuts away to a fake documentary format with a peanut gallery of bit players staring straight into the lens and helpfully explaining everything we've just seen. Thanks, Opie. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Gomorrah ★★ Matteo Garrone's pitiless expose of Italy's Neapolitan Mafia is full of despair and sobering statistics. Unlike their romanticized neighbors in Sicily's La Cosa Nostra, the Camorra has no illusions about tradition, honor or any of that Don Corleone junk. There's nothing here but money and murder. Working from a best seller by Roberto Saviano (who shares a screenwriting credit) Garrone traces this vile gang's reach through every level of society, from everyday street toughs, through haute couture sweatshops, all the way to toxic-waste dumps that poison an already dying community. But while Gomorrah is structurally impressive, it's also emotionally inert. Admirably avoiding sentimental mob movie clichés, Garrone forgets to offer anything in their place. The movie is a sociological study taken from such a jaundiced distance that there's nothing for us to latch onto. The characters are nasty, shallow people whose inevitable deaths come as a relief to the audience. Sure it's informative and well researched, but it's a grind. (At Kendall Square.)

Gran Torino ★★★ ½ A throwback to Clint Eastwood's cheap and dirty '80s crowd-pleasers, Gran Torino looks like it was shot over the course of a long weekend and cost about $15 to make. It's also extremely entertaining. Eastwood plays a growling, bigoted Korean War vet who gradually warms to a family of Hmong immigrants living next door. As he sputters, spits and cusses his way through scenes, this mean, old dog learns a few new tricks. The movie is pitched at the same hyperbolic level as Eastwood's oversized turn. Designed as his farewell to acting, the movie plays like catnip for longtime fans. There's a valedictory air to the work, studded with explicit references to characters like Harry Callahan, Gunny Highway and Josey Wales. Like his other films, Gran Torino has some satisfying shades of moral uncertainty lurking beneath the surface. But viewers will also get a giddy thrill of seeing a 78-year-old badass pulling a gun on gangbangers and snarling, "Get off my lawn." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

He's Just Not That Into You ★★ ½ Unexpectedly tough-minded and insightful for a fair stretch of its running time, director Ken Kwapis' adaptation of Greg Behrendt and Liz Tuccillo's best-selling self-help book starts out with both feet planted firmly on the ground instead of head over heels. The film takes a dim view of the dating scene, as Ginnifer Goodwin's high-strung serial clinger learns some hard lessons from Justin Long's bartender lothario. There's a surprisingly eccentric turn from Jennifer Connelly as a suspicious housewife whose hubby (Bradley Cooper) is enjoying too many late-night yoga lessons with Scarlett Johansson. Even Ben Affleck and Jennifer Aniston are decent for a change, playing a long-term couple wondering what it really means to be married. How infuriating then to watch the last half hour undercut the previous 90 minutes of bitter truths. Shoehorning these characters into one sappy Hollywood ending after another and selling itself short for chick-flick clichés, He's Just Not That Into You cops out and decides that he really is. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Brief Interviews With Hideous Men

This Is My Rifle, This Is My Gun

Director Matteo Garrone examines the Neapolitan Mafia in the fictional Gomorrah.

The International ★★ ½ At least Tom Tykwer's expertly crafted piece of ridiculous hokum has timing on its side. What's more apt for our current financial times than a thriller in which the villain is a bank? A smoldering Clive Owen gives his all as an Interpol agent hard on the heels of the dastardly International Bank of Business and Credit. Logic is in short supply, as we're repeatedly informed that this sinister organization has infiltrated and corrupted every level of government in every country around the world, but somehow its financial future seems to hinge on a small-potatoes arms deal with a tinhorn third-world dictator. But it's hard to care about coherence when you can sit back and marvel at Tykwer's bravura set-pieces. The German-born director of Run Lola Run has a knack for kinetic energy. The International's centerpiece sequence is a 14-minute cat-and-mouse scene in the Guggenheim museum that explodes into the best shootout since Michael Mann's Heat. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Milk ★★★ ½ Playing the title role in Gus Van Sant's rousing, surprisingly accessible biography of slain civil-rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years: He smiles. Oscar-season biopics often feel like homework, but Van Sant charts Milk's rise to prominence as the first openly gay man elected to public office as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead, who clearly hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High. Eight years ago, this gifted director turned his back on Hollywood, devoting himself to abstract, lyrical films like Gerry, Last Days, and his recent Paranoid Park. In such difficult company, Milk feels startlingly conventional. It's crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining, yet crafted with savvy visual intelligence by Van Sant and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides. Like the inclusive American ideals Milk so boisterously advocated, the movie is open to everybody. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Pink Panther 2 ★ ½ Steve Martin's recent memoir, Born Standing Up, was one of the sharpest and most insightful books ever written about the art of comedy. So it's anything but funny to see that Martin's follow-up act is a coscreenplay credit on this moldering pile of worn-out gags and goofy accent jokes. Martin once again makes a mockery of Peter Sellers' iconic Inspector Clouseau, substituting the precise slapstick of those early Blake Edwards films with stumblebum pratfalls and an untoward amount of shouting. The convoluted caper finds Clouseau assigned to a "dream team" of international detectives, which unfortunately means we're stuck watching Andy Garcia, Alfred Molina and Yuki Matsuzaki play up some seriously tacky ethnic stereotypes. Martin's Inspector is inconsistent from scene to scene. His competency varies according to the needs of the plot, and an ill-advised subplot in which he's required to take political correctness from Lily Tomlin steals shamelessly from Borat. Martin should be ashamed. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (In the suburbs.)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy-tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in suburbs.)

Taken ★★ ½ Here's another slick, lurid thriller from writer/producer Luc Besson in which the French director employs his trademark blend of brutal action sequences and mawkish sentimentality. It's a tricky mix that Besson got just right in 1994's The Professional, but he's found diminishing returns ever since. Liam Neeson stars as a retired CIA assassin turned overprotective dad. He blanches at his precious teenage daughter's wishes to follow U2 across Europe, and it turns out father really does knows best, because young Kim (Maggie Grace) has barely stepped off the plane in Paris when she's kidnapped by snarling Albanian sex traffickers. What follows is a brisk procession of ass-whoopings, with towering, tree-trunk Neeson snapping limbs and tossing corpses all along the Seine. It's completely preposterous and more than a little stupid, but director Pierre Morel knows his way around a fight sequence, and his burly leading man injects a surprising gravitas to a one-note, Jack Bauer knockoff. Neeson's early monologue, threatening his daughter's kidnappers, is itself almost worth the price of admission. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Waltz With Bashir ★★ ½ Sifting through long-buried memories of Israel's 1982 Lebanon war, Ari Folman's autobiographical documentary tells a story from so many standpoints and with such lack of affect that the movie remains elusive. The animation style is both striking and off-putting. It resembles the rotoscoping used in Waking Life and Chicago 10, but Waltz was created with a mix of Flash, 3-D and traditional animation techniques, so certain scenes look more like a Web site than a movie. Some events are dramatized while others are simply recited straight into the camera. The surreal combat scenes are memorable and harrowing, but Folman's use of repressed memory syndrome as a cliffhanger device feels phony and cheapens the material with Hollywood conventions. The aloof, distant quality of the film gnaws at you, and not even a final flourish of sickening, real-life photography can bridge the gap. In Hebrew with English subtitles. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

The Wrestler ★★★★ The movie is shrewd enough to use Mickey Rourke's decimated visage to its advantage. Hell, it's practically a monument to his personal ruin. Rourke's washed-up wrestler, Randy "The Ram," is a teetering wreck who doesn't stand a chance of recapturing his former glory, and every close-up hammers that point home. Faced with a health crisis, he makes a few efforts. He reaches out to a sympathetic stripper (well played by Marisa Tomei) who similarly finds herself growing too old for her profession. He briefly attempts to reconnect with his estranged daughter (Evan Rachel Wood), but all the damage he inflicted in the past can't be easily undone. The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions, it simply asks that we spend a little time with these people and live inside their world for a spell. Here, at last, is a true sequel to the original Rocky, full of quiet desperation, squalid backdrops and earthy humor. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square, Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

NAME GAME

The Ting Tings have a ball making great tunes that pop.

The Ting Tings play the Paradise Rock Club March 18.

KATIE WHITE DEFENDS HER identity in the Ting Tings' sassy dance-pop smash "That's Not My Name," but the British duo can't control connotations arising from the band's moniker.

The singer had worked in a boutique with a Chinese girl named Ting Ting, who said it meant bandstand in Mandarin. But the meanings began to multiply, drummer/producer Jules De Martino says, until they discovered their fans in Japan were partial to interpreting Ting Ting as "cute penis."

"I couldn't work out why we had 20,000 people for our shows and the girls in the audience had their hands over their mouths," De Martino says. "I was going 'This country is amazing.

They've still got their culture intact—like the geisha women.' And of course it wasn't. They were laughing at me walking onstage with the name Ting Ting attached."

Perhaps not coincidently, the male sex organ recently outranked bandstand among the top definitions submitted for Ting Ting on the online slang site the Urban Dictionary.

No matter how you define them, the Ting Tings have quickly become a worldwide hit thanks to "That's Not My Name" and the new wave–disco reboot "Shut Up and Let Me Go," which Apple featured in an iPod commercial.

Barely more than a year ago, White, 25, and De Martino, 34, were a couple of Manchester musicians living, working and partying in an artists' collective at an old cotton mill.

Weekend parties became an outlet for people to get drunk and throw paint on the walls while he and White would DJ, De Martino says of those nights at Islington Mill. "It was a way to listen to music like 'Ghostbusters' and 'Kung Fu Fighting' that made us dance and forget that Monday morning, we're going to have to be struggling again."

The Ting Tings had lost faith in the music industry after their first project, the Portishead-inspired Dear Eskiimo, was signed and dumped by a major label. So they reteamed as a duo making art-pop for the fun of it. White learned guitar while De Martino provided keyboards, bass, guitar and vocals in addition to drums.

"Everything is completely live. We make loads of mistakes."

They recorded songs at the mill, posted them on MySpace, and burned CDs for friends.

Then word caught on about the Ting Tings' parties, first with the press and eventually major-label executives, who sat on the floor amid the craziness. "The harder you try to draw that type of people in or get work, it doesn't come," De Martino says from London before an almost-sold-out U.S. tour that hits the Paradise March 18. "We couldn't have planned it—and we didn't. We're not that smart."

What De Martino and White did have was yin-yang chemistry. He studied fine arts after growing up with a love for the Beatles, Elvis Presley and experimental B-sides. She was dabbling in costume design after being weaned on the Spice Girls. They found common inspiration in edgy dance outfits like the Gossip and Talking Heads, echoed in the "Crosseyed and Painless" groove of "We Started Nothing," the title track from the Ting Tings' debut album.

"It was a fantastic combination because you have extremes in the studio," De Martino says of working with cowriter White. "She didn't come from that [arts] background I did. But equally, I get inspiration from her when it comes to writing pop songs and hooks. She's coming from a novice point of view, and sometimes that has a more powerful effect."

Onstage, the Ting Tings strive to maintain that two-way spontaneity by triggering percussion, synthesizer and bass lines via pedals. "Everything is completely live," he says. "We don't use any kind of time code or playback. Every arrangement is totally diverse. We make loads of mistakes."

After another U.S. tour this summer, the duo plans to occupy another artists' space—this time in Berlin—to tackle a follow-up album.

"One of the first things we'll do is put a huge canvas up on the wall to document the whole time," says De Martino, recalling parties in England where their fans decorated blank sleeves for 7-inch singles. "People can put a hand print on it, write on it or stick Polaroids on the canvas. So over the four-month period, we'll end up with a big artwork that can be the front cover.... The last thing we think about is the recording process, which is the most boring part of making an album." ✖✖✖

One More Time, Baby

The Pop Star Cometh Oops! She's doing it again. After what seemed like endless tabloid coverage of head shaving, private-part flashing and barefoot bathroom adventures, Britney Spears has kicked her toxic habits and, with her new album, Circus, reclaimed the title of pop music ringleader. Taking her show on the road, the Circus Starring Britney Spears pitches its tent at the TD Banknorth Garden on March 16. The spectacle boasts a three-ring stage, aerial acts and lavish costumes designed by the Blonds—promising a whipcrackin' good time. The Pussycat Dolls will also be on hand to sport the latest in barely-there latex couture and writhe through hit after hit. Britney's back and there's no creepy paparazzi-boyfriends or bags of Cheetos in sight. Gimme more? Yes, please. Let's just hope she's not driving the tour bus. Kyle Wright

Arresting Visuals

Colored in Controversy Before Shepard Fairey's Obama portrait graced the cover of Time magazine, you probably saw his ubiquitous work on a stop sign, behind a building or on an album cover. The scope of Fairey's media—including screen prints, stencils, stickers, rubylith illustrations and collages—and his aggressive display tactics are guaranteed to piss someone off. When Supply & Demand, Fairey's retrospective at the ICA opened on Feb. 6, he was welcomed by more than just a mob of fans—an outstanding arrest warrant for vandalism got him a ride with the Boston Police. Something tells us Fairey won't quit just yet, though. Check out his iconic images at the ICA through Aug. 16.

A LANDMARK EVENING

I Should Have Such Problems...

There may be no such thing as a free lunch, but there's certainly such a thing as a free concert, thanks in part to the Boston Landmarks Orchestra, which performs classical concerts in historic venues without charge. To insure its ability to continue doing so, a swanky group gathered in the Brattle Street home of the orchestra's founder and maestro, Charles Ansbacher, and his wife, Ambassador Swanee Hunt, whose living room can comfortably hold a hundred or so and is decorated eclectically with things like a Wyeth painting of Rudolph Nureyev, African masks and a large gold harp.

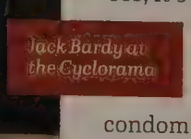
Hamid Benbrahmin and Greta Meszoely at the Boston Landmarks Orchestra event

Nina Fialkow and Mikko Nissenen at Ben Mezrich's birthday party

Laura Littlechild and Katie Rutledge at Minibar

Present and accounted for: improbably handsome literary agent Ike Williams, the delightful duo of Hamid Benbrahmin and Greta Meszoely (who were celebrating both his birthday and their anniversary), the soignée Suzanne Bloomberg and people with fun names like Westy Egmont and Zoltan Csimma.

After a buffet supper, everyone hustled over to Sanders Theatre to watch Ansbacher conduct a concert that included a performance by 15-year-old prodigy Kong Qi, who acquitted himself brilliantly playing Grieg's Piano Concerto in A Minor.



Kong Qi plays at the Sanders Theatre with the Boston Landmarks Orchestra

Jennifer Epstein and Bill Keravouri at the Boston Center for the Arts party

A flawless evening. The worst that could be said about it—as someone pointed out—was that the Chagall hanging over the door leading into the kitchen was slightly crooked.

A New Arrival...

To introduce its incoming executive director, Veronique Le Melle, the Boston Center for the Arts hosted a Cocktails and Cabaret party at the Cyclorama, drawing the likes of board chair Philip Lovejoy, Beehive owners Jennifer Epstein, Bill Keravouri and Jack Bardy, arts booster Bill Nigreen, famed architect David Hacin, famed photographer Joe Greene, at least one habitual party crasher, and a guy who said, as Le Melle stepped onstage, "I had a fight with her over a parking space on my way here!"

Jack Bardy at the Cyclorama

Tonya and Ben Merrick at Ben's 40th b-day party at Minibar

Whether or not he was serious, what could possibly be a more quintessential welcome to Boston ?

Hey, Big Spender...

Bringing Down the House wasn't just the title of one of Ben Mezrich's best sellers; it's an accurate description of the 40th birthday bash thrown for him by his wife, Tonya, at the new hotspot Minibar.

Seen tossing back cocktails and delicious little nibbly things while toasting the birthday boy were such high-profile types as Boston Ballet honcho Mikko Nissenen, gallery owner Laura Littlechild, party pair David and Nina Fialkow, up-and-coming fashion designers Sam Mendoza and Michael DePaolo, TV Diner hottie Jenny Johnson, über-photographers Bill and Kerry Brett, brooding musician Danny Gallagher, the absurdly gorgeous Katie Rutledge and one slightly overserved guy who either tried to give me a lap dance or tripped over his own two feet.

The following exchange was overheard at the bar:

"Do you have a winter sport?"

"Yes, it's called gin martinis."

Meanwhile, one woman pointed out, "You know it's a good party when someone finds both an earring and a condom on the floor."

"This place might be called Minibar," said someone else, summing up the scene, "but I can guarantee you Tonya's not getting a mini bar tab."

We Have a Winner!

Well done, Shauna Colleary of the Residences at the Intercontinental! You were the first reader to correctly identify the hallucinatory photos from the Big Night benefit for Big Brothers Big Sisters of Massachusetts Bay in our Feb. 18 issue. Hope you enjoy the T-shirt, even if it isn't tie-dyed. ✖✖✖

LIVE NATION

Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. stellaartois.com

Union Busting

Giving marital advice is like passing gas at the dinner table and blaming the Queen. It's rude and presumptuous. Even so, when my daughters grow up, this is what I'll tell them if they ever decide to latch themselves to some mouth-breather with a genetic imperative:

Marriage is totally gay. Or sometimes it's straight, but the point is that a lasting relationship is based on patience, humility, empathy and reliable credit lines. Prescription tranquilizers don't hurt, either.

As for your weddings themselves, my dears, consider the example of the Masai tribe of southern Kenya. Among these happy folk, a groom must give his fiancée's father a gift of three cows, a calf and a goat. This is proper and good. In no way is dad expected to blow $30,000 on an open bar for a pack of sweating freeloaders who blind themselves with chardonnay before fumbling through the Electric Slide. That would be barbaric.

But I understand that every bride wants a fairy tale. So we're going with Goldilocks and the Three Bears. Porridge for everybody, and watch out, those chairs are wobbly.

Now, where's my goat?

Monsoon Weddings

GOOD KARMA

IT'S HARD TO OUTDO SHOBHA Shastry. The owner of Alankar Event Planners & Wedding Decorators in Northborough, Shastry caters to Boston's Indian-American community, as hard as any to please when it comes to spectacular nuptials. How hard? Her clients sometimes want the groom to ride a pachyderm into the ceremony.

"I tried to arrange an elephant for a wedding at the Park Plaza in October," she says. Unfortunately, however, the family had to shelve the idea. "The street next to the Park Plaza was not very wide. The elephant you can do if there is a lot of room and the parking lot is big."

Alankar means "decoration" in Sanskrit and, in that department, Shastry also handles big orders. She supplies mandaps (enclosures where the bride and groom sit while trading vows) and organizes sangeets (celebrations when women paint henna tattoos on their hands) for around 80 weddings a year that attract as many as 350 guests apiece.

Indian-Americans traditionally hold lavish nuptials that echo those on the subcontinent, where entire villages attend celebrations that can last for days. If America has influenced the younger generations, she observes, it's to tone things down. "The kids are very sensible to the issue that there need to be limitations."

So what does Shastry tell couples looking for something less ostentatious than a $6,500-an-hour elephant? "The groom can come in on a horse," she suggests.

Drink of the Moment

Defrost Setting

It's that time of the year when Mother Nature starts to screw with us. Every spring preview is matched with a winter postscript, and the days in between are a slushy limbo. It's a perplexing phase. Are we thankful or impatient? Do we wear sneakers or boots? And what, exactly, do we drink?

Time is running out on your chance to enjoy a hot beverage. The Toddies and Tom & Jerrys are shuffling away for their summer hibernation, and soon even our coffees will convert into the ubiquitous wave of iced Dunkin's. As a final salute or flip of the bird to winter, head to Deep Ellum. A barstool is an ideal setting for any season, but nothing beats sipping on something warm and alcoholic while watching suckers wait for the bus in the snow.

Deep Ellum's Cabin Fever ($8) mixes hot coffee with boozes made by people who know how to shake the cold. From New Hampshire comes Cabin Fever liqueur, a spirit fermented from nature's greatest condiment—maple syrup. From Portland, Ore., there's eau de vie of Douglas fir, essentially brandy on conifer growth hormones. It's a potent infusion blended into whipped cream and then "splashed" into coffee. "And when I say a splash, I mean half a bar spoon," warns owner Max Toste.

The eau de vie adds some heat complemented by the cocktail's temperature, while the whipped cream extinguishes the flames. "The greatest thing about it is it's not sweet," Toste contends. "I mean it's obviously a sweetened coffee drink, but it's not stupid." And in these disorienting times, it's a smart order.

Good Eats

Hardcore Corn

East Boston business owners have bemoaned the looming harbor tunnel toll hikes, but chef/owner Lionel Betancol has nothing to worry about. At both his original Maverick Square Rosticeria Cancun and his newer Meridian Street outpost, the Mexican, Ecuadoran and Salvadoran food is fresh, flavorful and dirt-cheap. The menus are taco-heavy, but the handmade pupusas deserve equal billing. These thin, toasty corn discs are dense with stretchy cheese, fried bits of chicharrón (pork rinds), creamy refried beans, or a combination thereof. Topped with crisp, vinegary curtido (Salvadoran slaw) and doused with mild, tomato-y salsa, they're a fantastic deal.

ASK THE EXPERT

SUSAN GEORGE IS FOUNDER OF HARVARD SWEET BOUTIQUE.

Toffee is known by a few other names, like "butter crunch." It has an alluring brown-sugary molasses flavor, blended with roasted almonds, and we usually cover it with a thick layer of milk-chocolate or bitter-chocolate and white-chocolate swirl. Almonds are then generously sprinkled on top and the toffee bar is broken into many irregular pieces and then packaged. It was one of the first products that we sold at the Harvard Sweet Boutique. I would recommend everyone try toffee at least once. We usually don't get many requests for toffee for weddings, but for a winter wedding it would be the perfect snack to warm you and your guests up. It's personally my favorite snack, because you can just grab a piece without feeling too full afterwards. But remember: Toffee is hard. One day this woman came in and asked me, "My grandma has dentures; would you recommend the toffee?" and I had to quickly respond "No!"

FRENCH LESSONS

Boston is replete with prestigious institutions of higher learning, but not ones that serve herb-crusted monkfish. At least, not until Le Cordon Bleu opened Technique, a restaurant staffed entirely by cooking students training to enter the city's viciously competitive cuisine scene. Simply adorned but capitalizing on the 19th-century brick walls of its 150-seat spot in the Athenaeum building, Technique offers reasonably priced and ambitious entrées. "Here we've got people who are passionate about learning," says chef instructor Jeff Mushin, who earned his chops at the original Rebecca's on Charles Street years ago.

From waiting tables to preparing dishes, students do everything at Technique. The roasted beet and turnip salad served with toasted hazel nuts ($4.95) is a lesson in color and presentation. A flat-iron steak marinated in cabernet-wine sauce ($11.95) was butchered upstairs in the school's Meat and Fish Fabrication course.

Having opened almost a year ago as an affiliate of Le Cordon Blue in Paris, the Boston school has placed its students in top local restaurants like Craigie on Main, Rialto and Uni as either full-time employees or externs. Technique is designed to prepare them for the hustle of those venues while offering the latitude they might not have until they manage their own kitchens, says Mushin. "In a restaurant, you get to use 10 percent of the knowledge you have," he says. "Here, you get to use 90 percent." JOHN DYER

POP UNCULTURED

TO "ENTERTAINED PASSERBY" from The Improper's Feb. 18 issue:

You wondered why someone graffitied "Toy Story 2 was OK" on an empty wall behind the Star Market in Allston. You really have to start watching Comedy Central and YouTube a lot more. Graffitiing "Toy Story 2 Was OK" is a Demetri Martin joke. If you Google the term, you'll find it graffitied all over walls nationwide.

The pissed-off Demetri Martin royalties protector

To the ski hero:

You came to my rescue when I dropped my poles on the rope tow. You had a rugged beard and the nicest smile at Nashoba Valley. I had a light-blue jacket, white pants and two useless friends. I wish I hadn't blown the opportunity to thank you. Maybe we could grab a hot cocoa together.

Snowbunny

To the handsome man on the D train:

It was a Wednesday night, and we both got on the train at Arlington. You were carrying a gym bag and wore headphones. I was the tall girl with short, black hair. I'm pretty sure you were checking me out, and I was giving you the go-ahead to say hello, but you never did. I gave you every opportunity: I moved a bit closer to you, I turned my iPod off, and I smiled at you. I got off the train at Fenway and you just smirked at me as I left. We could've turned the D train into a love train, but you let it go right off the tracks.

Looking for love

To the girl dancing at Harry's:

It was just an average night out at Harry's in Brighton, and you were dominating the music selection. I'm not going to fault your taste in tunes, because you had the place jumping. It was evident that you were in your own little world and had a knack for dancing. When Janet Jackson's "Feedback" came on, you really went crazy and waved your arms in the air in some move that I've never seen before and haven't seen since. What you neglected to see was the lamp that you knocked over and sent crashing down on the table below. Two innocent bystanders got their drinks with a side of shattered glass. One of them, a poor girl, got cuts all over her arm. Maybe you should've watched where you were swinging instead of pretending to be the dancing queen. You could've at least offered to get the girl a Band-Aid.

FIT FOR A KING

It's always tempting to let your buns idle on the sofa, but two new, high-end fitness clubs are betting on your drive for self-improvement.

An Equinox gym is launching in the space previously occupied by State Street Bank, maintaining some of its predecessor's interior design, including the 2,000-pound vault door. "[The door represents] power, pride, everything you'd expect from a financial institution," says Scott Rosen, chief operating officer at Equinox. Opening in the Financial District in early April, Equinox will feature five fitness studios and, of course, a full-service spa.

Across the Charles, Evolve Fitness in Cambridge recently added a second location with 21,000 square feet of posh amenities including plasma TVs, a babysitting service, even an upscale lighting system to cheer those with Seasonal Affective Disorder. There's a women-only section and green bathroom systems for eco-friendly flushers, not to mention the usual bells, whistles and spinning classes. With bikini season just around the corner, it's time to get off the couch. KRISTEN CICCOLINI

Maid to Measure

No one wants wedding-photo flab, so Revolution Fitness training specialist Jason Reese has introduced a new regimen to help brides and their bridesmaids firm up before the big day. Participants complete customized individual training sessions as well as weekly group ones. "The group workouts bring a sense of camaraderie that helps them stay motivated," Reese says. It's every bridesmaid's chance to do some prenuptial bonding by working up a sweat instead of just working up the nerve to put on those heinous dresses. Allie Vasilakis

BETTER LATE

The true costs of sexualizing our kids

EVERY DAY, TWEEN and teen girls are "abnormalized," exposed to disturbing sexual images that previous generations would have considered totally beyond the pale. Britney wriggles and young girls wriggle back, assimilating the myth of being thin, famous and sexy.

As Wheelock College Education professor Diane E. Levin and local lecturer Jean Kilbourne note in their new book, that poisonous influence conveys a message to girls that they have to compete with each other by starving themselves and dressing in age-inappropriate outfits. With little ballast from meaningful relationships and still less ordinary decency, girls are hurled unprepared towards the famous confusions of adolescence: anorexia, impersonal sex, alcoholism, depression, even suicide. The guy-parallel includes violent rap music and Grand Theft Auto, which expose their male counterparts to images of rape, murder and promiscuity. This sexed-up world, strongly driven by unhealthy commercial interests, desensitizes kids and blunts worthy emotional connections between budding girls and guys.

So Sexy, So Soon
By Diane E. Levin and Jean Kilbourne
Author Levin teaches at Wheelock College; Kilbourne is a local lecturer.

What to do? Levin and Kilbourne urge parents and teachers to communicate with teens, employing just enough non-hovering concern. The goal is to have rich relationships, not just hookups or online interactions. Crucial, too, is developing a critical stance on the skinniness imperative, and on the rattlesnake wiles of advertisers. ✖✖✖

You can pre-order poultry and meat via their Web site, where you'll also find directions to the tiny store attached to their house near Verrill Farm. NOT TEA TOTALLY Cynthia Gold adds life to the leaf.

SHE HAS THE distinction of being Boston's only tea sommelier, but Cynthia Gold isn't one to rest on her laurels, or on any other leaf, for that matter. Gold, also an accomplished pastry chef and owner of the fondly remembered Tea Tray in the Sky, has just signed a contract to publish a book she's been working on for years.

Culinary Tea will feature about 100 recipes, but it's "not really a cookbook," says Gold, whose day job as the Park Plaza's resident tea sommelier has encompassed a complete overhaul of the hotel's ongoing program of tea classes, daily afternoon tea service and the creation of tea-infused cocktails and other recipes.

"I want to teach the possibilities of working with tea; I want people to take its [culinary] potential seriously," she says, to use tea to "change flavor profiles and textures," as in her favorite recipe: chicken marinated in pu-erh tea, then baked in clay. "It tastes like a game bird, with earthiness, richness, depth," she says. "[It doesn't taste] like tea."

NOT JUST FOR BREAKFAST ANYMORE: When the beer judging starts in the midmorning hours, is it a foregone conclusion that the winning entry is the one that's brewed with oatmeal? No, of course not, but that's what happened at the final round of the second annual Samuel Adams Patriot Homebrew Contest. As one of the lucky judges, I can report that the victorious oatmeal stout is a dark, robust beer that's sure to provide manly sustenance to Patriots fans when it's served at the Sam Adams Brewhouse in Gillette Stadium during the upcoming football season. Congratulations to home brewer David Rosenbaum of Andover!

THE ROAD TO L MAY be paved with good intentions, but even chef Marc Orfaly couldn't make a go of the restaurant space at Louis Boston. After few short months, Restaurant L has folded as quietly as a cashmere sweater.

COLUMBUS RESTAURANT GROUP

Dining { BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI }

GOLDEN OLDIE

Superb pub grub and charming details make up for Marliave's speed bumps.

FISH UPON A STAR Trout with sautéed shrimp is a highlight of the dinner menu.

FULL AND FAIR COVERAGE of a restaurant requires patience. My first visit to Marliave in its recent incarnation left me lukewarm. Did this restaurant's 124-year history provide reason enough to write a review, despite the inconsistent food that I first encountered?

I reported my misgivings to the editor. When I described a failed appetizer of dense duck meatballs with dry foie gras ravioli ($13), he urged me to make another visit and sample the pub cuisine on the downstairs menu. To my report of cracked and crumbling floor tiles, shabby staircases and the dismal lighting of the upstairs dining room, he suggested this look may be intentional—an ornamental patina—to emphasize the eatery's age and tradition. So I went back. I'm happy I did. This place grows on you, although my five return trips were not without speed bumps.

Dining with my wife on the day after Valentine's, we were hardly greeted and received barely satisfactory service. Our choice of pizza ($14) as a first course disappointed. Although it boasted a superb topping of sweet and tart San Marzano tomatoes, abundant cheese and excellent pepperoni, the thick, doughy crust was substandard. The flat-iron steak ($18.50) showed promise, its hearty flavor enhanced by a well-constructed sauce redolent of roasted garlic. Unfortunately, it had been cut into slices and crowded into a bowl with a mountain of tasty but soggy fries, which impaired the texture of both. On the other hand, the roasted chicken ($18) demonstrated the chef's prowess with this kitchen benchmark. With crisp skin and juicy flesh, this half bird was enlivened with garlic and herbs and came with a delightful risotto, at once creamy and resilient.

Another bump on my journey came on a different evening with Yankee pot roast ($18). The roast—actually a short rib—could have been memorable, with flavorful roasted root vegetables, Yukon Gold potatoes and a robust, delicious red-wine sauce served in a handsome cast-iron casserole. Unfortunately, I must have placed my order just as the pot was close to the bottom. The beef consisted of just a couple of forkfuls of tender meat together with clumps of almost pure fat—flavorful to be sure, but not what I was expecting. The remainder of the dishes I tried passed with flying colors. A generous appetizer of mussels steamed in white wine and garlic ($10) became a meal in itself, the broth becoming a substantial soup with wedges of fleshy, juicy tomatoes. Even better was the clam chowder ($12), which was full-bodied and intensely flavored with two luscious hunks of smoky bacon. My only quibble with the chowder was the two large unshelled clams. A bit tough, they would have been better chopped or minced. Rounding out the seafood offerings was the fresh trout ($18), the best dish I tried. Sautéed with capers, wilted spinach, quartered plum tomatoes and two jumbo shrimp, the fish had been cooked and plated with such finesse and care that not one errant bone intruded. The exquisite flavor lingered on my palate.

Marliave, due to its location around the corner from Downtown Crossing, does significant business at lunch. I sampled a number of sandwiches, including the first-rate burger ($10), a well-seared, rare and juicy specimen garnished with lettuce and tomato. A sandwich called Mister Marliave ($9) featured ham and deliciously nutty Gruyère cheese on top of and between slices of grilled bread in a sandwich so large it lapped over the sides of a dinner plate. Pastrami ($10), curiously served on a bun instead of on rye or pumpernickel, was simply the best I've had in some time—exquisitely moist and savory. New Yorkers take notice. Burgers and sandwiches come with an excellent deli-quality dill pickle and a side of fries, baked beans or a green salad. The beans, infused with the rich flavor from a substantial hunk of fatback, should be mandatory—classic Boston cuisine at its most exalted. Desserts included a moist, voluptuous bread pudding ($9) garnished with a scoop of house-made ice cream.

By the time I finished my Marliave odyssey, I was a quasi-convert. Quasi, because I lament a number of easily remedied deficits: no draft beer; ragged, sometimes inattentive and overly casual service; and a pricey wine list that belies the otherwise good value. Balancing these are charming details like the heavy, handsome tableware, elegant wine glasses and covered tray service that creates an almost Victorian air. I don't know if Marliave will last another 124 years, but if it can achieve consistency, it will get a good start on that challenge. ✖✖✖

CALL OF DOODY

There's at least one company that's still hiring.

Contrary to popular reports, several people in this country still have jobs. Maybe they've been paid in Phil Plantier rookie cards and Spam for the past few months—I personally saw all this coming and exercised my Spam options last August—but jobs nonetheless. In fact, some companies are even hiring. To prove it, I recently decided to check out a few employment listings and see if I could find myself a position. And that's how I became an apprentice pet-waste removal technician for DoodyCalls.

DoodyCalls is a company that will come to your house and clean up the dog crap in your yard. And they're hiring. I call Paul Delaney, the owner of the Boston franchise (yes, DoodyCalls is a franchise), who tells me that he expects solid growth this year. After I'm done snickering and repeating the phrase "solid growth," Delaney agrees to send me out on a rotation in Hingham. It looks like I've got myself a job. And possibly the only one involving fecal matter that hasn't been covered by Mike Rowe.

Oops. I did it again.

The next morning, I'm picked up by a woman named Sarah, who's driving a green DoodyCalls truck. We chat a bit on the way, and Sarah says she has a degree in environmental biology. She's worked for DoodyCalls for about a year, and seems to feel it's a pretty chill gig. "On nice days, it's just like taking a hike outside," she says. I point out that it's different than a hike, though, in sort of an important way. "True," she says. "People at dinner conversations sometimes don't go any further after they ask me, 'What do you do?'"

I soon learn the answer to that question, as we arrive at the first house and unpack the tools of the trade—a rake and scooper lined with a trash bag. Sarah checks her notes on the house to see what kind of enemy fire we'll be dealing with during this operation. "OK, at this house we've got Sasha and Mocha, a miniature pinscher and a miniature schnauzer." Got it. I can see she's ramping me up slowly. I was a little worried that she was gonna haze me first with a house full of elderly great danes who like to eat rope.

We work the lawn in a grid, raking and scooping until the perimeter is secure and completely free of yard muffins, schnauzer sausages and Beagle bombs, to use some lingo of the biz that I just made up. I rake up a discarded Crayon box, just because I'm a surprise-and-delight kind of guy.

We return to the truck and place our white kitchen bags inside a heavy contractor bag in the back. "At this house, we take it away," Sarah says, "But other places, we'll leave it there and triple-bag it." Next, protocol requires that we spray our shoes and tools with diluted bleach to avoid cross-contamination of yards. Then the tools go back in the truck—all facing in the same direction, so the handles don't touch the poopy parts—and we finally scrub our hands with disinfectant. Inside the vehicle, I notice a plastic bag filled with small biscuits, and I say, "Oh, that's nice. So you bring treats to hand out if the dogs are home?" Sarah looks at me like I might not be too bright. "Those are animal crackers," she says. Of course they are. Damn greenhorns can't tell an animal cracker from a Milk-Bone.

Over the next few houses I learn that canine crap can be surprisingly hard to recognize, especially when people don't rake their leaves. At one house, I think I've found a mongo keeper, but it's just a profoundly rotten apple. Mostly, there's surprisingly little crap around. "Sometimes," Sarah says, "people pick it up before you get there." Like cleaning your house before the maid shows up, I guess.

At the last house, Sarah warns that we might have to abandon the mission if the dog is home and in his pen. Charlie the Bernese mountain dog, she says, is neither small nor cooperative when visitors approach his domain. As we walk to the pen, I look down and spy a frozen paw-print so colossal that it looks like it belongs in a diorama at the Museum of Science. "So, Charlie's a big pup—" I begin to say before the air is rendered by a sonic boom, a rolling thunderclap of canine rage. Charlie is home. And we are leaving.

Paul arrives to give me a lift back to town, as Sarah has a lot more ground to cover today, and I'm probably slowing her down. I ask him how much this service costs. "It probably averages around $20 per visit," he says. "It's an affordable luxury. We're expanding this year more than I anticipated."

The Dow may be down, but the Doody is on the rise. ✖✖✖

SUCKER PUNCH

The eternal appeal of getting rich quick

I FIRST HEARD ABOUT Bernie Madoff at least 15 years ago. Several of my clients had some funds with the confessed swindler. "I don't know how he does it," one of them said. "And I don't care. Every year he pumps out great returns." My client looked a little sheepish. "But, you know," he said, "I've never been able to read any of his statements. And neither can my accountants."

"Did it ever occur to you," I said, "that if he can't explain to you in simple terms what he does, maybe something's wrong?"

"Yeah," my client answered. "But I like the checks." He died some years ago and the Madoff money was paid to the estate. The IRS may yet come after that money.

Back in the mid '90s, I got a call from one of my best friends. He had been in the healthcare industry, living in the Southwest. "I've switched careers," he told me. "And in three years, I'm going to retire to Montana and fish."

"Get rich in three years?" I asked.

"You bet. When you visit next time, I'll fill you in. Bust my tail for three years, retire. And I'll be helping people." When next I visited him, he appeared to me to be a Stepford wife, a robot who gave automatic, artificial responses to everything. "There's no such thing as getting rich in three years," I told him. "Unless you hit the lottery."

"If you doubt," he said to me, "it's negative energy." Of course, he was pitching a pyramid scheme, and eventually he abandoned his family and lost all touch with his past. But I do know that it's now been 15 years and there's still no pot of gold. Just illusion. We're all looking to hit the jackpot, particularly if, as with Madoff, we think others are cashing in. Mob psychology brings in the sheep, ready to be shorn.

People have approached me over the years with various chances to get rich. Some of these included a man who had an idea for rich families to protect their children from kidnapping. He suggested "putting a chip in one ear when the rich kids are born, so they can be electronically monitored." I passed on that one. Another man came to my office and showed me a potion in a bottle. "We can make millions," he said. "No matter how drunk you get at a bar, if you swallow two tablespoons of my mixture, you can pass any Breathalyzer test." Next. Some years ago, a client said, "If you give me $10,000 dollars, I'll let you have a piece of my revolutionary product." He showed me a white plastic tube that looked like a 4-inch striated strip of macaroni. "The simpler the product," he added, "the more effective and the bigger the markup to the consumer. So simple, it's genius." I stared at the piece of macaroni. "OK," I said. "I give up. What's it supposed to do?"

He gave a grin of triumph. "It allows women to pee standing up." We live in an entrepreneurial nation, don't we?

I once went in with a friend on a horse, a trotter named Wit's End Bunny. Where people get their horses' names has always mystified me. But then, whenever I've gone to tracks over the years, I always bet on superstition. If the filly has the same name as your eighth-grade girlfriend, go for it. Bunny seemed to race only at tracks in New Jersey and only, for me, at inconvenient times when I had to work or go to relatives' weddings. The horse never seemed to run in the money, and I was always getting calls from the general partner to kick in more dough for vets and special diets. The capper was when I told a few people who owned horses about my partnership.

"Trotters?" One of them said, "Only people in double knits or shiny blue suits own trotters. I wouldn't be bragging about this." Basically, he was calling me a peasant, which is actually true in many ways. But I was a peasant whose trotter was costing more in food and medical care than I was paying for my family. The bleeding stopped when we sold Bunny for an amount equal to a few copays for my dermatologist.

My all-time favorite scam was devised in high school by my friend Zeke, an original wit who defied authority his entire life and went against the popular grain in wonderful ways. "I've got an idea," he told me. "I just need a scientist to help me with the formula. But I've nailed the marketing plan."

"Whatever it is," I said, "I can handle it."

"It's Span-Tran," Zeke said, beaming at me.

"Yeah?"

"It's a combination Spanish Fly and a tranquilizer. You take it, get all sexually excited. But if no one's around to take advantage of it, you don't give a damn."

And you're surprised by Bernie Madoff? ***

Soroff On PEBBLES

The morning radio DJ on Girl Scout cookies, an Oprah do-over and sexism in hip-hop

JAM'N 94.5 MORNING COHOST PEBBLES, a radio personality in Boston for the past 20 years, was raised in Wareham and graduated from Northeastern University. She began her career as an intern at WILD 1090 AM, eventually joining the on-air team and staying for seven years. On JAM'N, she fronts half of the wildly popular Ramiro and Pebbles Show, announcing news, traffic and entertainment updates as well as hosting The Ladies Room. Pebbles is a passionate literacy advocate, having been involved with Read Boston, First Book, Read Across America and Reading Is Fundamental. She also supports the Boys and Girls Clubs and the Waltham Girl's Group and received the MLK Dreamers Award from the City Year program. As a Girl Scout troop leader, she devotes her Saturday mornings to the organization. She lives in the suburbs west of Boston.

Jonathan Soroff: How'd you get your name?
Pebbles: The first program director I had sat me down and gave me the choice between Pebbles, Gypsy or Asia, and I went with Pebbles. My real name is Susan Semedo, and I guess they wanted something spicier. I almost went with Asia.

You're a Girl Scout leader. Can you start a fire with two twigs?
I've done it before. Not in years, but I did it when I was a Girl Scout, like 10 or 12.

Very impressive. Favorite Girl Scout cookie?
It's changed over the years. I think I have to go with the Caramel Delights with the coconut on them.

Which badge came most easily to you?
I think I earned every single badge there was, but I guess it would be one of the camping ones. I love sleeping outdoors. I go camping with my whole family every summer.

Most embarrassing on-air gaffe?
I once called the Museum of Fine Arts the Museum of Farts, which was a little embarrassing. But the first time that I was on the air, after saying the scripted stuff I was supposed to, I just froze. And then I started crying and saying, "Oh, God, I hate this. I never want to do this again." And I hadn't shut the mike off, so that went out. That was probably the worst. But here I am 20 years later.

Ever swear accidentally?
No. And right now, I'm the only one on the morning show who hasn't.

Do you speak the same way off the air?
I do. Most people who meet me say I'm the same.

Celebrity you were most awed by?
Tom Cruise, definitely. I've met a lot of actors and artists, but he's like the celebrity. Oprah was probably the other one. I just sort of sat there staring at her. I would like a do-over with Oprah, if you could arrange it.

Most difficult artist?
Sometimes it's the new artists. A lot of them are feelin' themselves a little bit, and they don't know how to handle themselves, or it's like pulling teeth to talk to them. Experience really goes a long way. When you meet someone like Diddy or LL Cool J, people who have been around, they've been trained more.

Tell me a secret about Ramiro.
It's not bad, but he really does care about his looks. All the guys I work with do. I've never met guys who cared more about their looks than women do. They're all obsessed with their weight, and I'm like, "When was the last time I went to the gym?" Ramiro gets up every single morning and works out at 3 am, and my treadmill at home is one big clothes hanger.

Are you naturally a morning person?
No. Not at all. And all these people in my business say, "Oh, I've gotten used to it over the years." Not me. I'm still grouchy in the morning and need coffee, and I like to stay up late at night. At 11 o'clock, I'm up watching Sex and the City reruns, and next thing you know, I have to be up in two or three hours. But I'm really good at napping.

Have your cohosts ever taken a "Jam Scam" a little too far?
I'm one of those people who feels bad when someone starts to feel uncomfortable, so I'll worry that they do. But the average person is like, "They're so funny." So over-the-top too far? No.

What would happen if Matt Siegel of KISS 108 sat down next to you on a plane?
[Laughs.] First of all, I think he'd probably be in first class and I'd be in coach, so it wouldn't happen.

Any thoughts on the sexist lyrics in rap and hip-hop?
That's tough, because obviously I don't agree with all the lyrics, but I feel like I'd be a hypocrite to criticize the way I make a living. I think you hear less and less of it these days, though.

Top three songs in heavy rotation on your iPod right now?
My iPod's missing right now. It's somewhere in the bottom of a bag in my car. But I'll give you artists. I love John Mayer, Jennifer Hudson and the new artist Jazmine Sullivan.

Most memorable live show you ever saw?
The Monster Jam when Kanye West performed was pretty amazing. I loved seeing Alicia Keys. Oh, and not to date myself, but I love Earth, Wind and Fire. And Jill Scott. She's a favorite.

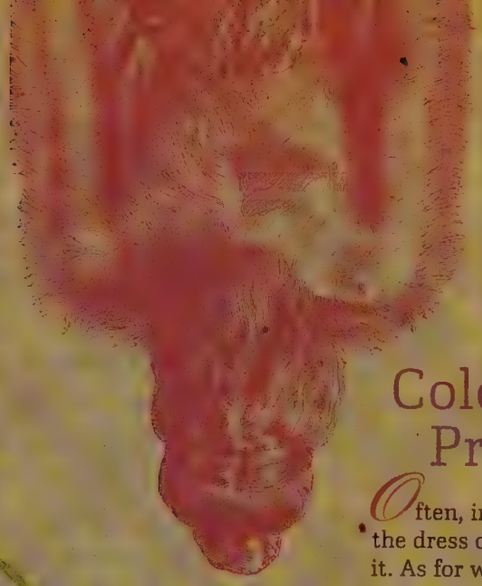
Explain your professional longevity.
The one thing I hear most often is that I'm the voice of reason on the show. Even though people love the craziness of morning shows, I think they want a balance.

Do you donate to NPR?
I do not, and you're going to make me feel bad about that, aren't you?

OK, last question: Is there a Bam-Bam we should know about?
[Laughs.] I do have a Bam-Bam. I've been with him for about two and a half years, but he's very private. I've never said his name on the air. Ramiro calls him Mr. E, as in "mystery." ✖✖✖

Guest Intentions

BY MARNI ELYSE KATZ



10 Tips for behaving properly at weddings

A couple likes you enough to invite you to their wedding, the "best day of their lives" (certainly the most expensive). The rules of conduct are pretty basic: Smile, be on time, say please and thank you. In other words, mind your manners. Such courtesy sounds simple, but when alcohol flows and emotions run high, it's easier said than done.

It's Not an Invitation to Argue

When a thick and creamy invitation shows up in your mailbox, respond promptly. If it didn't come with a fill-in-the-blanks card and envelope, pull out your personalized stationery and compose a formal note to accept or decline. As for who will be attending, decipher the calligraphy on the envelope. If it's addressed only to you, then go solo. No exceptions. Do not ask if you can bring a date because you'll feel like a loser amid the happily marrieds. Do not ask to bring your new boyfriend because you think he's "the one." If it says "and guest," you're entitled to bring the date of your choice, but avoid controversial picks. Don't invite a groom's old girlfriend, reasoning, "She's like one of the guys." The bride will not appreciate it. And don't badger the couple to add someone to the guest list for your own amusement. One bride tells us, "My fiancé's sister pitched a fit, because we didn't invite the man she was cheating on her husband with to our wedding. We had never even met him, never mind it went against everything that marriage is about."

Color Me Pretty

Often, invitations state the dress code. Adhere to it. As for whether women can wear white, save your sugar-spun confection for your daughter's tea party. Black is fine, especially at night, but if it's a garden wedding or breezy beach affair, consider adding color for the occasion. If it's a second wedding, try to figure out what color dress the bride chose. I once planned on wearing a sky-blue silk faille dress to a wedding in Italy, until I found out the bride's dress was the same color. (She's since married a third time, but still.) Another bride begs, "Leave the sunglasses at home."

Take a Seat

The bride and groom pore over seating charts as if they are battle plans, and, often, they are. They're aware of the long-standing family feuds, and which frat brother is universally despised among the bride's BFFs. So respect what they've decided and don't switch the place cards. Former wedding planner and current bride-to-be Faith Larsen says, "Guests need to understand that absolutely everything is up to the bride and groom. They'll try to make everyone as comfortable as possible, but simply can't consider everyone's demands." Nor should they have to. It's their party, so sit down and shut up.

Singles Scene

With all that love in the air, it's inevitable that single (and sometimes not-so-single) guests find themselves feeling a bit frisky. Save the extracurriculars for later. Wedding photographer Nicole Friedler has stumbled upon a lot of outrageous behaviors on the job, including finding the sister of a groom having sex with another guest—in the bathroom—during the reception. Another woman tells of a bridesmaid who disappeared after the ceremony to have a quickie and missed the group photos. And every wedding includes a vampy lady with an oh-so-low-cut dress, and an usher on the prowl who even propositions Great-Aunt Tildy. A wedding is a celebration of one couple's love, not an invitation to seek a grand passion of your own.

She's a Tosser

If the bride is determined to incorporate every traditional wedding practice, including tossing the bouquet, it's best to indulge her. Reluctant? Gather 'round with the other single chickadees, smile and hope it doesn't fly your way. Superstitious and desperate? Too bad. Do not engage in hand-to-hand combat against your competitors, be they bridesmaids, flower girls or grandmas. Shelley Barandes, owner of Albertine Press in Somerville, remembers, "My husband's grandmother swooped in and grabbed the bouquet away from my 10-year-old cousin.... We have photographic evidence."

Drinking Problems

Stories abound, of course. There's the woman who got so drunk during the cocktail hour she slept off her bender in the foyer of the hotel. The tipsy guest who told the whole table of the torrid affair she was having with a married man, who was a guest at that very wedding. And (a classic) the aunt of the bride who puked on the valet. Enough said.

Present Perfect

Etiquette experts concur that guests have three months after the nuptials to purchase a present; not one year as legend has it. Cambridge resident Emily Kumler of the blog Manners101.com bluntly states, "That whole one year thing is for lazy people who don't know the rules." Even if you don't attend the festivities, you should send a gift, unless you don't know the couple well, or haven't seen them in quite some time. As for what to buy, use the registry. You might think a teacup and saucer are boring, but the bride will be delighted that you have contributed to her now full service for 12. We promise. And be sure to have it sent. The last thing the bride and groom need to worry about that night are keeping track of crystal bowls and candlesticks.

Toast of the Town

Holly Safford of the Catered Affair in Hingham suggests that guests who wish to offer a toast clear it with the couple beforehand. They may have decided to forgo a custom that often leaves guests bored. If you get the OK, be succinct and remember that this is a toast, not a roast. The point is to offer warm wishes to the couple, not degrade them in front of 200 of their nearest and dearest. A friend recently told me about a rehearsal dinner speech given by a maid of honor that outlined all the men the bride had ever "been with." It was a long list, with details aplenty. She was fired from her post, and after the wedding, the bride never spoke to her again. And who knows what kind of issues it caused with the groom, who may not have been aware of her, um, history.

Technology Terrors

Turn off your cell phones as soon as you step out of your car, even if you customized your ringtone to blare "Here Comes the Bride." Think twice before you snap pictures during the ceremony, especially one with a religious element. Besides, nobody likes the guy who stands up, blocking others' views, to get the perfect shot. Most importantly, don't make catty comments near the videographer. Wait until you're well out of earshot to bitch about the bridesmaid dress or degrade the doltish groom. The last thing you want is for verbal diarrhea to make its way onto a wedding video.

Until the Bitter End

No matter how bored/drunk/heartsick you feel, etiquette dictates that you remain at the reception until the cake has been cut or dessert has been served. When it's time to take leave, bid the bride and groom farewell with a handshake and a kiss. Hopefully, you've already sought out the couple's parents to offer congratulations, but if not, do so now. In the morning, pull out your personalized stationery one last time and thank whoever hosted the affair. You'll be one of the few that do, so they'll always remember you as the perfect guest.

Attack of the Groom

Prima donnas in black tie

BY LINH TRAN BRINCAT ILLUSTRATION ALLISON COLE

WEDDINGS CAN MESS with your mind. When my husband and I got married recently, both sides of the family scoffed at our modest desires for a small beach ceremony, tearing apart our plans with the relish of nit-picking monkeys. So instead of one wedding, we ended up with two: one for each mother. No barefoot vows on the sand (handicapped attendees might've gotten stuck, according to our moms), no barbecue reception (so the neighbors wouldn't think we were cheap) nor bonfires (too associated with huddled homeless people). Few of our original plans made it down both aisles with us, but our minor triumphs I credit to my groomzilla-ish fiancé who won us the right to make our own invitations. And the freedom of getting a chocolate cake.

I saw firsthand how interfamilial stress wreaked havoc on my partner's ordinarily placid temperament. If you watch the reality shows Bridezillas and Whose Wedding Is It Anyway? or romantic comedies like Bride Wars and 27 Dresses, you'd think the only people who obsess over décor and hair are the ones wearing the white veils. But countering the cliché is a growing group of men who insist on more visible roles in planning their special day. Groomsonline.com, one of many Web sites catering to them, even argues that caring about such details is the macho thing to do: "We deserve control.... [Without] having participated, you will look like a loser who let his woman do everything." According to this black-is-white, up-is-down logic, real men should demand dominance... over the seating chart and color scheme.

But with power, comes pressure. When weather, hidden costs and feuding family members are unknown variables, fixating on the invitation font or iPod playlist can be a way of exerting some semblance of predictability. According to Costofwedding.com, the average American couple spends $20,398 on their nuptials; the average Bostonian couple spends between $20,959 and $34,932. And this doesn't include the price of an engagement ring or honeymoon. With the economy on a downward spiral, it's a wonder everyone doesn't elope. As so many people bleed that much cash or credit on something with more moving parts than Meryl Streep's résumé, it's understandable why groomzillas are joining their female counterparts in the popular imagination. Mywedding.com even launched "the Great Groomzilla Search," defining the term as "a new breed of fanatical grooms who wrestle for full wedding detail control and obsess over every detail of the big day!" Apparently, little girls no longer have proprietary ownership over exclamation marks, either.

Based on purely anecdotal evidence from local wedding professionals, here are three types of groomzillas we've identified from this emerging, aggressive genus.

Double Agent

The double agent is so good at creating a front of agreement that his bride might be misled up until her wedding day that their desires are in synch. Chrystyna Kassaraba, guest service and event director for the Beehive, tells us how she dealt with her first, and she hopes her last, double agent. At the initial stages, the couple agreed that they both wanted a traditional sit-down dinner with ivory tablecloths to keep attention on the space's dramatic architectural features. "And then it began," Kassaraba recalls ominously. The groom started bombarding her with phone calls and e-mails in which he asked her to change all those details they'd talked about. And not tell his fiancée. The double agent might even convince others, as he did with Kassaraba, that this is what his partner would want. She remembers him claiming, "I am responsible for the creative side of things in the relationship… so let's just move forward and keep the plans between us. I know she'll love the changes." Devious planning may lead to self-doubt and recriminations. Kassaraba felt guilty towards the bride, who had no idea her husband had been going behind her back. "I felt like I was cheating on someone. Someone was definitely being sketchy!" Unlike in the spy world, where there's at least a chance you won't get caught, with wedding planning, it's inevitable that groomzilla will be found out. Kassaraba had to finally stage an intervention to end all the "craziness." Though the bride forgave the groom, Kassaraba suggests that "guys [should] know what's good for them and stay out of the bride's way."

Fire-Breather

The fire-breather might erupt at any moment, and his lack of control over his public explosions makes him the most disagreeable of groomzillas. Naz Kupelian, owner of Naz Kupelian Salon in Lexington, still shudders at the memory of one such monster. It wasn't so much that he made the hair appointments for the wedding party, or came into the salon in person days before to confirm the scheduled time, says Kupelian. Things became tense when the man arrived with magazine pictures of how he wanted his fiancée's hair to be styled and bossed everyone around. The bride turned alternately angry with her betrothed, then silent and passive. "It was horrible," Kupelian recalls. Making Kupelian's staff uncomfortable with his demanding attitude, the groom wouldn't let up. "He kept saying, 'This is how I like it' or 'I like…' It was all about him." The yin to the flip-flopper's yang, the fire-breather couldn't care less about pleasing others, fixated as he is on himself. His domineering temperament bodes poorly for the marriage, as it did for the couple at Kupelian's salon, who divorced after only a few months.

Flip-Flopper

The flip-flopper is characterized by such open-mindedness to new ideas that all notions, no matter how bizarre, carry equal weight. Not having spent much time contemplating style and appearance before his engagement, he becomes convinced that his family and peers might recoil in disgust if his wedding isn't up to par. One such groom shocked his friends when he changed from the kind of guy whose wardrobe consisted of "old armpit-stained T-shirts and jeans" into someone who couldn't stop talking about centerpieces. His wife recalls the abrupt shift: "He's generally not like this at all. I never really had a picture of my wedding in my head, just sort of not my thing, but I was really surprised that he did. He really made a lot of the wedding decisions." His friend Gwen Leung, owner of Gigi Floral Design, was the recipient of his numerous suggestions. The most creative (and quickly vetoed) plan was to adorn the flower arrangements with birds—without specifying whether he meant taxidermied ones or fake ones, or how that would fit in with the theme they had decided on months earlier. Because the groom wasn't "a 'fashionable' person himself," Leung says, "I found him struggling to find out what he really wanted. And in the end, I question if he really wanted things for himself, or to try to please his siblings or his dad." His bride agrees, "Most of his crazy wedding behavior was fueled by his family. We were going to do minimal floral arrangements. But his dad was very insistent that we have a lot of flowers." Paradoxically, the flip-flopper's desire to please leads to an indecisive stalemate that makes him all the more annoying.

Chances Are You've Been Sitting on a Cure for Cancer

Before Lance, even before LeMond, there was the PMC, a 190-mile bike-a-thon that brought cycling to the American consciousness. Since 1980, the PMC has raised almost $240 million for cancer research. Today, 100 percent of every rider-raised dollar goes directly to that cause.

PMC 2009 – August 1 & 2 – 6,000 cyclists from 36 states and 6 countries will ride. Last year, the PMC raised $35 million for cancer research at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute. Are you ready to take the Pan-Mass Challenge?

INDIE MUSICIAN AND BRIDE-TO-BE KAREN BARNICLE ROCKS THE SEASON'S MOST STUNNING WEDDING DRESSES.

As the lead singer of a popular local indie band, Karen Barnicle is comfortable drawing a crowd—which is exactly what she did in the busy Liberty Hotel lobby for our bridal shoot. She's also a natural in front of the camera, having posed for several of her eponymous band's album covers (yes, the group's named Barnicle).

Karen enjoyed playing dress-up, but when it comes to her own upcoming nuptials to fellow bandmember Lucian Garreau, she plans to go with a minimalist Nicole Miller bridal gown (off Craigslist, no less). Whether it's a frothy frock or a low-key gown, though, this rockin' bride wears the dress. The dress doesn't wear her.

Priscilla of Boston Platinum label dress, $4,650 at Priscilla of Boston. Tom Binns necklace, $1,580 at Alan Bilzerian Boutique. Majorica pearl necklace, $325, and Christian Louboutin shoes, $795. Both at Neiman Marcus.

NOTES FROM THE UNDERGROUND

AT THE ACADEMY Awards in Los Angeles, filmmakers hope to pick up a little man of glittering gold named Oscar. At the 11th annual Boston Underground Film Festival, they aspire to claim Bacchus, a Donnie Darko–esque, cigar-smoking bunny. Tempted to join the fun? You should be. The festival's trophy reflects the gonzo, Dionysian attitude of its showings, which include films like Sundance favorite Anywhere U.S.A., an art-house flick with a nonprofessional cast, and Modern Love Is Automatic, a feature about a nurse who moonlights as a dominatrix. With awards like "Most Effectively Offensive," the festival is a great chance for anyone looking to step out of the mainstream. SCOTT GREENAN

We'll Always Have Paris

For Quasimodo, every day is hump day. Victor Hugo's oft-adapted tale of unrequited love gets the goth treatment in Vox Lumiere—The Hunchback of Notre Dame. Pairing the 1923 silent film with a soaring glam-rock score, this concert-movie-dance hybrid is a twisted retelling of the story with all the crucifixes and chains of a Black Sabbath show. Coraline ★★★ Neil Gaiman's psychologically spiky novella gets a fairly faithful rendering from gifted stop-motion animator Henry Selick, who previously tickled eyeballs with his beloved The Nightmare Before Christmas and the terrific but underrated James and the Giant Peach. Voiced without much gusto by Dakota Fanning, our title lass is a neglected only child who happens upon a secret tunnel leading to an alternate universe where doppelgängers of her distracted parents are suddenly affectionate and doting. Of course, they do have buttons for eyes, but that's probably the least creepy thing about them. A psychedelic trip down a dark rabbit hole of youthful anxieties, Coraline is never less than a visual marvel, even when Gaiman's leaps of dream-logic become more head-scratching than mind-blowing. If you have the option, I'd check out the 3-D version, which wisely foregoes the usual gimmicky gotcha effects and instead uses the wondrous Real D technology to further envelop you in Selick's richly detailed, carefully rendered world. Also, it's nice to see a heroic cat, for a change. (Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Crossing Over ★ ½ A few years back, Harrison Ford famously turned down Steven Soderbergh's offer to star in Traffic. (The role eventually went to Michael Douglas). He obviously regrets the decision, at least judging from his glum appearance in this knockoff. Attempting to apply the same multi-storyline sprawl that Soderbergh used to investigate the drug trade, Wayne Kramer's picture drones on incoherently and at great length about our modern immigration woes. With a single, constipated facial expression, Ford anchors the film as a haunted INS officer who rounds up illegals in sweatshops and hides a secret soft spot for pretty young Latinas. Across town, Ray Liotta's sleazy bureaucrat sexually exploits an aspiring Australian actress (Alice Eve) looking for a green card, while his clueless wife (Ashley Judd) begs to adopt an African orphan. Kramer is known for brash, intriguingly distasteful pictures like The Cooler and Running Scared, but Crossing Over lacks the lurid energy of those films. It's stolid, lifeless Oscar bait, as grimly one-note as Ford's performance. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Curious Case of Benjamin Button ★★ David Fincher, the gifted and sardonic director of Fight Club and Zodiac, goes Forrest Gump in this shockingly syrupy take on an old F. Scott Fitzgerald short story. Borrowing the premise and little else from the original work, Button stars Brad Pitt as a quizzical fellow born as a elderly man who ages backwards as the film grinds on. And on. Some gorgeous, state-of-the-art digital effects have been invented to place Pitt's face on all sorts of incongruous bodies, but besides existing as a technical marvel, there's little point to the proceedings. Screenwriter Eric Roth seems to have recycled his Forrest Gump script, changing a few names but keeping the central notion of a bumpkin in a doomed romance naively wandering through blunt historical signposts with a surfeit of cornpone aphorisms. There's no actual conflict as we wait for Pitt to grow young and die, just a lot of pretty pictures, plus the visceral nagging disappointment that a talent as subversive as Fincher's stooped to helming shiny Hollywood sap. (In the suburbs.)

Friday the 13th ★ How lame do you have to be not to improve on the original? Michael Bay's Platinum Dunes is a company devoted to remaking low-rent, brand-name horror flicks by pumping up the budgets and glossing over any rough edges that made the originals interesting in the first place. Not that the Friday the 13th movies ever had much going for them, but at least their semipornographic incompetence provided an aura of danger that's missing from this overworked rehash. Mixing up the first, second and third installments of the unimaginative series, Marcus Nispel's version returns to Camp Crystal Lake, where that lumbering guy in the hockey mask is still hacking away at dumb teenagers who are foolish enough to have sex. Director Nispel performed a similar hatchet-job on Bay's desecration of The Texas Chainsaw Massacre and can't keep this thin material in motion for very long, rebooting itself whenever Jason runs out of kids to kill. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Frost/Nixon ★★ ½ In refashioning Peter Morgan's smash 2006 play for the big screen, director Ron Howard made a wise move casting original stars Michael Sheen and Frank Langella. This picture has a ton of problems, but at the very least, Sheen's sly performance as seemingly callow chat-show host David Frost and Langella's towering Tricky Dick have been preserved on film for posterity. Morgan's play positioned Frost's 1977 televised

LESS OF MOORE

The Watchmen adaptation struggles to encapsulate the comic.

Watchmen
★★½
Starring Jackie Earle Haley, Patrick Wilson, Malin Akerman, Billy Crudup and Jeffrey Dean Morgan. Based on the comic book by Alan Moore and Dave Gibbons. Screenplay by David Hayter and Alex Tse. Directed by Zack Snyder. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

WATCHMEN, THE LANDmark 12-volume doorstop written by Alan Moore and drawn by Dave Gibbons, is like the Finnegan's Wake of superhero comics. A brainy monolith that deconstructs itself as you're reading, Watchmen is often cited—alongside Frank Miller's The Dark Knight Returns—as the moment comic books grew up. Henceforth, insecure folk are forced to use the despicable term "graphic novel," because how could you seriously discuss something as silly as a comic?

Potential big-screen adaptations have been percolating since its publication in 1987. Terry Gilliam owned the property for years, but he threw up his hands and declared—perhaps correctly—that it's impossible to adapt. (And this from the man who figured out how to film Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas.) Directors like Darren Aronofsky and Paul Greengrass came and went, until finally the job fell to Zack Snyder, a technician who scored an unexpected box-office bonanza with 2007's odious 300, a doggedly loyal, CGI-enhanced rendering of Frank Miller's hymn to Spartan fascism that looks like gay porn directed by Leni Riefenstahl.

Snyder's ability to replicate comic book panels in fetishistic detail serves him well. Watchmen hasn't been adapted as much as it's been slavishly illustrated with special effects. But Moore's unwieldy epic has been too condensed here, even at two hours and 40 minutes. Snyder is more interested in brawn than brains, so most of Moore's finer philosophical points get buried beneath the carnage.

Set in an alternate 1985, one in which Nixon is serving his fifth term and the Cold War is heating up, Watchmen posits a world in which costumed avengers are so common they've been outlawed by congressional decree. The title team is a long-dormant band of caped crusaders spurred back into action when one of their own is tossed from a skyscraper, much to the paranoid consternation of Jackie Earle Haley's Rorschach—a psychotic brawler hidden behind a mask of perpetually shifting inkblots.

Donning ridiculous costumes and reclaiming the mean streets cures the erectile dysfunction of Patrick Wilson's Nite Owl. But not even an impending nuclear cataclysm can perturb the cool detachment of Dr. Manhattan (Billy Crudup), a brilliant scientist who, after a freak accident, is transformed into a blue naked being with god-like powers. Former team leader Ozymandias (Matthew Goode, who seems to be doing a bad David Bowie impression) has hatched a rather unique plan to bring about world peace, and, as in Moore's original comic, all traditional notions of heroism are questioned and eventually upended.

Snyder's stuck with the tricky task of wrestling Watchmen's meaty monologues and massive backstory into a crowd-pleasing blockbuster, and he gets about halfway there. Visually dazzling, every shot looks like a Dave Gibbons drawing come to life. At its best, the movie evokes that '80s brand of jittery atomic paranoia—subversively scored to Nena's "99 Luftballons"—and memories of a party-crazy era when mutually assured destruction always seemed to be one phone call away.

> This is probably as good as a movie version of Watchmen could ever be.

But the screenplay, by David Hayter and Alex Tse, is undone by the density of the source material. (I wonder if the movie will make any sense to someone who hasn't read the comic.) This is such an obsessively detailed, richly realized universe, it takes the film well over an hour just to establish all the players and their histories. Characters too often pause to deliver lengthy dissertations that play great on the page but stop the movie dead in its tracks. For a flick so full of apocalyptic ultraviolence, Watchmen often feels strangely inert.

There's much to admire here, particularly Haley's snarling performance as the bone-snapping Rorschach, all the more impressive because he spends most of his scenes behind a mask. Snyder's heroic, hard-R commitment to adult weirdness is something to behold, and he probably deserves credit for getting such a dour, doggedly strange picture financed by a major studio in the first place.

The truth is, this is probably about as good as a movie version of Watchmen could ever be. But the skeptical, questioning spirit of the original work has been lost in translation. Maybe Terry Gilliam was right—and some things just defy adaptation. ★★★ interviews with Nixon as a David and Goliath battle, a belated national catharsis in which the wily interrogator tripped the disgraced former president into something close to a mea culpa. Where Howard errs is exactly where this terminally dull filmmaker always errs: He treats his audience like imbeciles. We've got all the makings of a brilliant psychodrama playing out in the loaded glares and strategic statements of Sheen and Langella, yet Howard constantly cuts away to a fake documentary format with a peanut gallery of bit players staring straight into the lens and helpfully explaining everything we've just seen. Thanks, Opie. (Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Gomorrah ★★ Matteo Garrone's pitiless expose of Italy's Neapolitan Mafia is full of despair and sobering statistics. Unlike their romanticized neighbors in Sicily's La Cosa Nostra, the Camorra has no illusions about tradition, honor or any of that Don Corleone junk. There's nothing here but money and murder. Working from a best seller by Roberto Saviano (who shares a screenwriting credit) Garrone traces this vile gang's reach through every level of society, from everyday street toughs, through haute couture sweatshops, all the way to toxic-waste dumps that poison an already dying community. But while Gomorrah is structurally impressive, it's also emotionally inert. Admirably avoiding sentimental mob movie clichés, Garrone forgets to offer anything in their place. The movie is a sociological study taken from such a jaundiced distance that there's nothing for us to latch onto. The characters are nasty, shallow people whose inevitable deaths come as a relief to the audience. Sure it's informative and well researched, but it's a grind. (At Kendall Square.)

Gran Torino ★★★ ½ A throwback to Clint Eastwood's cheap and dirty '80s crowd-pleasers, Gran Torino looks like it was shot over the course of a long weekend and cost about $15 to make. It's also extremely entertaining. Eastwood plays a growling, bigoted Korean War vet who gradually warms to a family of Hmong immigrants living next door. As he sputters, spits and cusses his way through scenes, this mean, old dog learns a few new tricks. The movie is pitched at the same hyperbolic level as Eastwood's oversized turn. Designed as his farewell to acting, the movie plays like catnip for longtime fans. There's a valedictory air to the work, studded with explicit references to characters like Harry Callahan, Gunny Highway and Josey Wales. Like his other films, Gran Torino has some satisfying shades of moral uncertainty lurking beneath the surface. But viewers will also get a giddy thrill of seeing a 78-year-old badass pulling a gun on gangbangers and snarling, "Get off my lawn." (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

He's Just Not That Into You ★★ ½ Unexpectedly tough-minded and insightful for a fair stretch of its running time, director Ken Kwapis' adaptation of Greg Behrendt and Liz Tuccillo's best-selling self-help book starts out with both feet planted firmly on the ground instead of head over heels. The film takes a dim view of the dating scene, as Ginnifer Goodwin's high-strung serial clinger learns some hard lessons from Justin Long's bartender lothario. There's a surprisingly eccentric turn from Jennifer Connelly as a suspicious housewife whose hubby (Bradley Cooper) is enjoying too many late-night yoga lessons with Scarlett Johansson. Even Ben Affleck and Jennifer Aniston are decent for a change, playing a long-term couple wondering what it really means to be married. How infuriating then to watch the last half hour undercut the previous 90 minutes of bitter truths. Shoehorning these characters into one sappy Hollywood ending after another and selling itself short for chick-flick clichés, He's Just Not That Into You cops out and decides that he really is. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The International ★★ ½ At least Tom Tykwer's expertly crafted piece of ridiculous hokum has timing on its side. What's more apt for our current financial times than a thriller in which the villain is a bank? A smoldering Clive Owen gives his all as an Interpol agent hard on the heels of the dastardly International Bank of Business and Credit. Logic is in short supply, as we're repeatedly informed that this sinister organization has infiltrated and corrupted every level of government in every country around the world, but somehow its financial future seems to hinge on a small-potatoes arms deal with a tinhorn third-world dictator. But it's hard to care about coherence when you can sit back and marvel at Tykwer's bravura set-pieces. The German-born director of Run Lola Run has a knack for kinetic energy. The International's centerpiece sequence is a 14-minute cat-and-mouse scene in the Guggenheim Museum that explodes into the best shootout since Michael Mann's Heat. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Milk ★★★ ½ Playing the title role in Gus Van Sant's rousing, surprisingly accessible biography of slain civil-rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years: He smiles. Oscar-season biopics often feel like homework, but Van Sant charts Milk's rise to prominence as the first openly gay man elected to public office as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead, who clearly hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High. Eight years ago, this gifted director turned his back on Hollywood, devoting himself to abstract, lyrical films like Gerry, Last Days, and his recent Paranoid Park. In such difficult company, Milk feels startlingly conventional. It's crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining, yet crafted with savvy visual intelligence by Van Sant and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides. Like the inclusive American ideals Milk so boisterously advocated, the movie is open to everybody. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Pink Panther 2 ★ ½ Steve Martin's recent memoir, Born Standing Up, was one of the sharpest and most insightful books ever written about the art of comedy. So it's anything but funny to see that Martin's follow-up act is a coscreenplay credit on this moldering pile of worn-out gags and goofy accent jokes. Martin once again makes a mockery of Peter Sellers' iconic Inspector Clouseau, substituting the precise slapstick of those early Blake Edwards films with stumblebum pratfalls and an untoward amount of shouting. The convoluted caper finds Clouseau assigned to a "dream team" of international detectives, which unfortunately means we're stuck watching Andy Garcia, Alfred Molina and Yuki Matsuzaki play up some seriously tacky ethnic stereotypes. Martin's Inspector is inconsistent from scene to scene. His competency varies according to the needs of the plot, and an ill-advised subplot in which he's required to take political correctness from Lily Tomlin steals shamelessly from Borat. Martin should be ashamed. (In the suburbs.)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★ ½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy-tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in suburbs.)

Taken ★★ ½ Here's another slick, lurid thriller from writer/producer Luc Besson in which the French director employs his trademark blend of brutal action sequences and mawkish sentimentality. It's a tricky mix that Besson got just right in 1994's The Professional, but he's found diminishing returns ever since. Liam Neeson stars as a retired CIA assassin turned overprotective dad. He blanches at his precious teenage daughter's wishes to follow U2 across Europe, and it turns out father really does knows best, because young Kim (Maggie Grace) has barely stepped off the plane in Paris when she's kidnapped by snarling Albanian sex traffickers. What follows is a brisk procession of ass-whoopings, with towering, tree-trunk Neeson snapping limbs and tossing corpses all along the Seine. It's completely preposterous and more than a little stupid, but director Pierre Morel knows his way around a fight sequence, and his burly leading man injects a surprising gravitas to a one-note, Jack Bauer knockoff. Neeson's early monologue, threatening his daughter's kidnappers, is itself almost worth the price of admission. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Two Lovers ★★★ ½ Awash in romantic ambivalence and pained, inarticulated yearning, director James Gray's roiling melodrama should probably be considered ridiculous. While I concede that the film is fairly absurd and overwrought, I also found it impossible not to be swept up in its gonzo sincerity, tickled by the eccentric humor and dazzled by Gray's lush stretches of cinematic elegance. Joaquin Phoenix stars as a heartsick, bumbling mess who recently reclaimed his childhood bedroom in his parents' insular Brighton Beach neighborhood. He quickly finds himself courted by Vinessa Shaw's nurturing model of stability, but also pulled by the allure of Gwyneth Paltrow's druggy, shiksa basket case. Boasting a bold, go-for-broke performance by Phoenix and some uncharacteristically rough-edged work from Paltrow, the operatic Two Lovers allows its performers to conjure the heedless rush of true romance, while Gray's directorial rigor keeps the proceedings detached and clear-eyed enough to question whether their ardor is the effect of immature delusion. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Waltz With Bashir ★★ ½ Sifting through long-buried memories of Israel's 1982 Lebanon war, Ari Folman's autobiographical documentary tells a story from so many standpoints and with such lack of affect that the movie remains elusive. The animation style is both striking and off-putting. It resembles the rotoscoping used in Waking Life and Chicago 10, but Waltz was created with a mix of Flash, 3-D and traditional animation techniques, so certain scenes look more like a Web site than a movie. Some events are dramatized while others are simply recited straight into the camera. The surreal combat scenes are memorable and harrowing, but Folman's use of repressed memory syndrome as a cliffhanger device feels phony and cheapens the material with Hollywood conventions. The aloof, distant quality of the film gnaws at you, and not even a final flourish of sickening, real-life photography can bridge the gap. In Hebrew with English subtitles. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

The Wrestler ★★★★ The movie is shrewd enough to use Mickey Rourke's decimated visage to its advantage. Hell, it's practically a monument to his personal ruin. Rourke's washed-up wrestler, Randy "The Ram," is a teetering wreck who doesn't stand a chance of recapturing his former glory, and every close-up hammers that point home. Faced with a health crisis, he makes a few efforts. He reaches out to a sympathetic stripper (well played by Marisa Tomei) who similarly finds herself growing too old for her profession. He briefly attempts to reconnect with his estranged daughter (Evan Rachel Wood), but all the damage he inflicted in the past can't be easily undone. The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions, it simply asks that we spend a little time with these people and live inside their world for a spell. Here, at last, is a true sequel to the original Rocky, full of quiet desperation, squalid backdrops and earthy humor. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square, Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

NEW MATH

The Bad Plus adds a singer to stir up its cross-genre covers.

The Bad Plus plays the Berklee Performance Center April 3.

Bartzi Goldblat

THE BAD PLUS DELVED INTO Nirvana on its 2003 major-label debut These Are the Vistas, boldly reinterpreting the grunge-era anthem "Smells Like Teen Spirit" as a jazz tune. Pianist Ethan Iverson sketched Kurt Cobain's vocal parts with sober melodies, inverted harmonies and crashing crescendos that reverberated in whirlpools stirred by kinetic drummer David King and bassist Reid Anderson.

The instrumental trio returns to Nirvana on its new disc For All I Care, this time tackling "Lithium." But instead of piano and bass assuming vocal terrain, singer Wendy Lewis emerges to impart the song's opening line, "I'm so happy, 'cause today I found my friends..."

Lewis couldn't be more on target. She sounds nonplussed navigating the Bad Plus' decelerated tempos and tipsy accents with her languid alto. The trio sounds as if it has found a compatible accomplice.

"It came from the desire on our part to do something different, to collaborate with someone," Anderson says. "A singer was the obvious choice to continue along our path of deconstructing—and having this dialogue—with modern popular music."

Besides Nirvana, the Bad Plus has covered Blondie, Black Sabbath, Ornette Coleman, Aphex Twin and Rush on past CDs, although the progressive jazz combo never sounded more prog than it does recasting modern classical pieces by György Ligeti and Milton Babbitt on For All I Care. Joined by Lewis on eight of the disc's 12 tracks, the group brings a subtly skewed new voice to other pop-rock classics by Pink Floyd, Wilco, Yes, the Flaming Lips, Heart and the Bee Gees.

"We're there to support the singing, but at the same time, we're not supporting it in a polite, predictable way," Anderson says from his Brooklyn home, noting that the John Coltrane Quartet, with its established sound, once recorded with the romantic singer Johnny Hartman. "We're supporting it by playing music the way the Bad Plus plays."

"A singer was the obvious choice to continue along our path of deconstructing—and having this dialogue—with modern popular music."

Alt-rock singer Lewis, who performed in a '90s band with King in their native Minneapolis (where Anderson also grew up; Iverson hails from Wisconsin), says she tried not to let her often-understated vocals get in the way of the group's chemistry. "It's more about being one quarter of a four-part weave," she offers via e-mail. "I stick to the melody lines, keep it straight and hold down the center, which gives them the freedom to move the way they do."

She mentions Frank Sinatra's version of "September Song" as one influence on her approach on For All I Care. "I was so impressed with the way he just sang the song, embracing vowels and consonants, each letter aligning with a note," she says. "For me, that was an unexpected inspiration."

All three members of the Bad Plus have contributed knotty yet graceful compositions to past CDs. But the group always returns to covers—and For All I Care is all about them.

"It connects with audiences in a way that your original music won't," Anderson adds. "Because these people have such a connection with the [popular] song, they have a different experience with it than hearing an avant-garde piece of music where there's nothing for them to hold onto."

There's also a novelty in covering tunes from Stravinsky to U2 with only acoustic bass, piano and drums. "It forces you to think creatively," Anderson says. "Instead of plugging in and having the ability to use effects or volume to get an impact." He suggests that the toy walkie-talkies that King occasionally waves around to comic-sonic effect are as close to electronic as the group is ever likely to get.

When the Bad Plus plays Berklee on April 3, they'll do about half the show as a trio before Lewis joins them onstage. Both parties are enjoying the ride of a joint tour.

"The arc of the performance is really fun for us," Anderson says, while Lewis muses, "I've had the experience of losing myself completely in the delivery. Not unlike driving down a highway, lost in some train of thought and not knowing how I got so many miles down the road." ✖✖✖

Hang the DJ

Radio GaGa Lady GaGa shouldn't be mistaken for other blonde icons of her generation. Inspired by artists like Queen and David Bowie, the Manhattan-raised singer/songwriter takes pop music to a twisted new level with performances that experiment with what she describes as "shock art." The Fame, GaGa's first album, is filled with electro synthesizers, pop culture references and, most importantly, absurdly danceable tunes. With hard partying–themed lyrics and Warhol-esque promotional videos, the singer tackles the less bubbly elements pop artists often avoid (like going out in public without pants). When Lady GaGa's Fame Ball Tour hits House of Blues on March 30, listen to her advice: Just dance. Thais Collins
